"You don't mean to say De Viguy hesitated?—the hypocrite!"

"Not at all, but the young lady herself has not seen me; she is still in her convent."

"And you think she will be consulted?"

"I am sure she will; I will not force myself upon any one."

"Ah, well, girls are all alike! she will say yes, glad enough to leave school and be Mme. la Baronne Delaunay, with a handsome husband, a handsome house, and a handsome fortune. And then she will amuse herself. Poor things, they are so caged up!—they know nothing but restraint, whereas we men, by marrying, either lose our liberty, or——"

"Valuable liberty, truly! We do as we like, because no one cares what we do; stop out late because no one at home is longing for us; form silly friendships because there is no one to fill up the blank in our heart."

"Our heart! Really, Delaunay, conversation with you is like reposing in a shady arbor! Fancy a man of the court of his Most Christian Majesty Louis XV. talking about our hearts! Ah, here is François with chocolate; I drink in that most innocent beverage to the success of your Arcadian dream. May your choice be as sweet as your chocolate."

And so he ran on, and I reasoned with him no longer. A quoin bon? It was not worth the trouble. But am I so sure of the wisdom of my plans? I have seen her portrait; it is charming. Her parents are worthy people, and she is only fifteen; surely, at that age, she can have acquired no taint of the vices of the day, no taste for its artificial pleasures. She will yield to my superior experience. I will be so gentle with her; I will so truly make her feel the identity of our interests—but softly, she is not yet mine, she may never bear my name, for her wishes shall never be forced for me.

5th June.—Waited betimes on Mme. de Vigny, for she had, I know, fixed on the 4th for her daughter's arrival in Paris, and I could not rest till I had seen her and learnt my fate. There is a certain air of poverty about the apartments, in spite of the gentility of the lady's manners, which makes me fear that my fortune may be an acceptable prospect to the De Vignys, and I more than ever determine to ascertain for myself if the parents dictate to the poor girl her choice. After a brief apology for presenting so early in the day, "Is she arrived?" I asked, eagerly.

"Yes, indeed."

"And she was quite willing to come?"

"What a question! Gabrielle has never disobeyed her parents."

"But was she glad, happy, or did she weep?"

"Nay, I must admit she shed many tears; but what would you expect? She has been with the good nuns seven years, and she loves them dearly. She is so young she had never thought of changing her condition; and she is so timid, too. There were girls there no older than herself who cast such looks of envy upon her as she bade them farewell. 'Ah, how happy you will be!' they exclaimed. 'Come and see us when you are a great lady, and tell us all about court when you are presented.' But my poor Gabrielle only kissed them, and wept without speaking. They were all standing behind the grille when we drove away. But she is quite happy this morning; listen, is not that a merry song?"

"Ah, madame, let me go down to the garden to her. I must see her. I can wait no longer now I have heard her voice."

"What are you thinking of, baron? She has no proper attire; she yet wears her little convent frock! I have already sent for a mantua-maker. In a few days she shall be presented to you; but to see her alone before marriage, at any rate before signing the contract—impossible: that is never done. Monsieur le Baron must be aware of it?"

"I am, dear madame; but I am not bound by any of our absurd formalities myself, and I entreat you to set them aside in my favor. Good heavens, madame! what idea have you formed of your future son, that you are afraid to trust him to speak to your daughter?"

As I grew warm the lady was obviously embarrassed between her strong sense of the proprieties and her desire not to offend me. "I wish my husband were at home," she sighed.

"Listen, dear madame; you must allow me to see mademoiselle, for I have vowed never to marry a girl who cannot assure me that she voluntarily becomes my wife."

The lady looked still more uncomfortable. "She is so timid, she would not dare tell you so much."

"Well, at any rate, you must let me try. Do you not see that I am only consulting her interest. You consent. I go then; I shall be almost in your presence in that arbor."

The lady fairly cried as she again muttered something about her poor attire, but I hastily left the room. The more she desired the match, the more determined I became to ascertain if the daughter was averse to it; and a few seconds brought me into the garden. Gabrielle was standing under a lilac-tree—the sun glancing in chequered rays through the boughs upon her brilliant hair, her white throat, her simple dress. And I see that dear little frock now—a white chintz strewed with rosebuds; her face was bent over a lilly-of-the valley she was smelling, but the profile was exquisite; the little hands which held the flower were so delicate! My haste received a sudden check; it was for me to feel timid, uncertain. What if that lovely flower were not for me; what if that sweet face were to turn away from me with aversion. All my thoughts were confused, words failed me. Now that I had seen her, how could I bear to risk a refusal? I had almost resolved to return to her mother, and beg her to plead my cause; but I could not stir—that girlish figure, that elegant pose, that beautiful head, enthralled me quite. Suddenly she turned round and perceived me; a crimson blush overspread her face and neck, and she was bounding away like a startled fawn, when I boldly caught her hand, and, gently detaining her, explained who I was, and that her mother had allowed me to visit her in the arbor.

Poor little thing—how frightened—how agitated she looked! For seven years she had seen no man but the old priest: and her dress fluttered visibly with the beating of her heart. My own taught me how to reassure her. I had determined to be as correct, as respectfully ceremonious as her mother's scruples could have desired; but with that darling, trembling child by my side, how could I? I seated her on a little bench, on which there was barely room for us two, and still retaining her hand, I said, simply, "Gabrielle, your parents have allowed me to ask you to become my wife—did they speak to you on the subject?"

"Yes, sir."

"And the thought grieves you?"

There was a pause: I could see that she dared not answer openly.

"Do not be afraid, you are entirely your own mistress—no one will control your inclinations—no one will even persuade you in the matter. I will never see you again, if you tell me to go. If it does not make you unhappy, I will remain with you a little while: may I?"

"Yes, sir," she whispered.

"Then don't tremble so; have confidence in me, for I seek only to make you happy. Look at me and tell me if I am so very formidable?"

She raised her eyes as if from a habit of obedience, and dropped them again; then looked up again voluntarily and steadily. The truthful, beautiful eyes! how I dived into their lustrous depths! That look sealed my fate. Gabrielle ceased to tremble. She said little—but she listened willingly; and before I quitted her side she had given me the lily-of-the-valley she had been smelling when I first saw her, (I have it still.) Ah! what a change had taken place in my sensations when I rejoined the mother! I actually embraced the good lady.

"Well?" she said.

"She is an angel. I have not deserved such happiness; and she will love me soon—I know she will. Ah, madame, how can I thank you enough for such a treasure. And her dress is charming. Pray, do not alter it; do not spoil her lovely simplicity; do not make her look ever so little like the ladies of the court."

The good mother was immensely relieved by my enthusiastic admiration, but she said her daughter must have the trousseau of a lady; and so I came home to my solitary house in a state of elysium.

8th June.—My suit prospers; each day my Gabrielle (mine!) grows more familiar, more charming; but I feel a sort of panic when I consider her extreme youth and inexperience. She has seen nothing, known nothing—she does not dislike me, but with whom could she compare me? Her mother takes her from house to house to pay the customary calls to her relatives before marriage: but I know too well how such visits are endured. A kiss on the forehead, with kind congratulations from the elders, a bow from the young cousins, the distribution of a little box of bonbons, which old and young chump with the same relish, and the ceremony is ended, without my little Gabrielle having raised her eyes.

I shudder sometimes as I think of the wretched marriages I have known, and fancy that perhaps the poor young bride was taken from her convent to the altar, ignorant and innocent as my betrothed, and that, when it was too late, her eyes were opened, and her affections engaged when her duty bound her to another, a stranger!

It was my wish to retire to my chateau of St. Vermout, and there to lead with her such a life as cannot exist in this corrupt capital; but her mother, I see, expects her to be presented at court, and I myself feel scruples as to the kindness of selecting her lot for her ere she has experience to judge of it for herself.

"Yes, she must first see a little more of life, and here apropos, arrives an invitation from the vicomte's father, the Marquis de Grandchamps, to a fete champetre at his superb house at St. Maur. He tells me I am to meet Mme. de Vigny and her lovely daughter, in whose honor the fete is given. Ah! I have hardly patience to think of the old libertine carrying her about, and introducing her to his friends—male and female. Inconsistent that I am, is it not what I was just resolving was the juster course of the two?"

11th June.—The most lovely day favored the Marquis's fete, which was certainly a grand success. Mme. de Viguy offered me a place in her coach; it is a most antiquated vehicle, and so heavy that her four fat Norman horses could barely drag it along at the rate of four miles an hour. But what mattered the slowness of their pace to me—with Gabrielle seated opposite to me, with her bright young face, listening to my account of everything the journey suggested, particularly the donjon of Vincennes? Ah! I could not resist the temptation of making those large eyes dilate with terror, as I related to her, as graphically as I could, some of the horrible adventures of prisoners immured forever within those walls.

"And are there prisoners there now?" she asked, looking sadly at the fortified walls.

"Yes, many."

"So you said when we passed the Bastile," she answered "Two prisons in one drive, and on such a brilliant summer's day. The good God comfort the poor captives!"

I repented of the picturesqueness of my descriptions—alas! in no way exaggerated—when I found that I could not win another smile from her till we came suddenly at a turn of the road upon the Marne, winding here silvery bright in the sunshine, there blue and cool beneath the willows which overhang it. The grounds of the marquis slope down to the water's edge, brilliant with gaily-painted kiosques and Chinese summer-houses. Poles supporting wreaths of flowers, festooned, marked the approach to the house; and almost ere we had passed the gates a group of would-be shepherdesses, attired in white and blue brocade, all looped up with roses, and with blue ribbons floating from their crooks, advanced to welcome us and conduct us to the master of the revels. They were his daughters. Three years ago they were as fresh and as girlish as my Gabrielle. Now their beauty is entirely obscured by artificial adornments; not a look is unsophisticated, not a gesture is natural.

The fete, as might be expected, was splendid, and very much Gabrielle seemed to enjoy it, except when her modesty suffered as she was brought too prominently forward to public notice. I think what pleased her most was a delightful concert, in which the vicomte had performed to great perfection a selection from Piccini's Dido.

"Ah!" said the old marquis, observing her delight, "you young people find pleasure in all that wandering up and down, which, to me, is little better than tuning the instruments. If you had heard Lulli play the violin, so tender, so simple, yet so wonderful! It is my son who is wild after Piccini; he ordered the concert. He takes his part with such vehemence, that he has written at least twenty satires against Gluck: and at the famous battle at the Palais Royal he is believed to have knocked down about a dozen Gluckites with the feather out of his hat, which was the only weapon he had at command.

"All which," I observed, "does not hinder Gluck from being the greatest composer we have ever had, as I hope to prove to Mademoiselle de Vigny to-morrow, at the representation of his Orfeo."

The old marquis smiled. "I should have guessed you were a Gluckite, always of the severe school. Ah! mademoiselle, you must enliven your future husband; make him one of us. Do not allow him to frown down upon our innocent frivolity, like a Parisian Cato. Time is so short; why not improve it by gilding its wings, since we cannot clip them, and crowning it with flowers, since we cannot conceal its old bald head."

The marquis then begged me to lead out Mademoiselle de Vigny for a minuet; but though her mother nodded approvingly at the proposal, Gabrielle herself grew pale with timidity. She dared neither refuse nor accept; and most gratefully she thanked me when I assured her that she was there only for her own pleasure, and need do nothing that was painful or disagreeable to herself.

On our return home, as the moon was at the full, Madame de Vigny had caused no footman to attend us with torches—the way, too, being so long; but the moon was often obscured by clouds, or concealed by the tops of the trees. In passing along the Bois de Vincennes we were for nearly half an hour in darkness. Madame slept profoundly. Never before had I had my betrothed so entirely to myself; and from low whispers of affection we sank into a silence more eloquent still of love. I took her hand, and it returned the pressure of mine; I could not see her face, but I drew her nearer—nearer to me—and on her forehead I imprinted the first kiss I had ever dared to take, half-fearing the while lest she should resent it; but my lips still lingered on her brow when I felt her dear arms cast arouud me —her heart was beating against mine, her mouth sought mine. O joy! all that I felt for her she felt for me; it was no quiet acquiescence in an inevitable doom; her being had bounded forth to meet mine. Not a word was said, but from that moment I felt she was my wife. All scruples ceased; it mattered not where she went, or whom she saw, she was mine as voluntarily as I was hers.

12*th June*.—Conducted Gabrielle and mother to the representation of Orfeo. Ah, poor Gabrielle, how deeply she was moved—it was all real to her—her dear eyes never wandered for a single moment from the stage, aud flashed with hope or filled with tears as the story changed; but when at last she saw Orpheus about to turn round, unable to bear the importunities of Eurydice, she clasped her hands passionately, and exclaimed aloud, "Why do you not trust him when he loves you so much!" Involuntarily Eurydice looked up to our box, and so did many others. Poor Gabrielle, covered with confusion, sat as far back as she could, and the crimson had not faded from her neck when De Grandchamps entered.

"I have come to felicitate you," he exclaimed. "What would I not give to believe once more in a play! I can only just remember the sensation, but it was very delightful. Now, you see, I'm only wondering whether Orpheus's G sharp will be true. Gluck never before received such praise as yours. I had intended to ask you if you did not think it dreadfully heavy stuff; but when I saw your face I knew it was useless to try and get auy censure from you. You have espoused Delaunay's tastes before himself."

He spoke in a bantering way, as usual, but I could see that he was unusually charmed by the modest grace aud beauty of Gabrielle; he looked at her continually, and chatted to her with so much fun, and such a candid confession of all badness that she was soon very much entertained with him, aud gave him some of those silvery peals of girlish laughter which he told me were as melodious agaiu as any air of Gluck's. Returning home, I asked her how she liked De Grandchamps. "I thiuk him very amusing; of course, I do not believe iu all the wickedness he pretends to boast of. I suppose, ou the contrary, he is very good."

"And why so?"

"He could not be so gay if he were guilty—remorse would poison his life. He could not make a jest of his sins."

Poor innocent Gabrielle! I thought. Is that all thy penetration? then art thou safer with a protector less guileless thau thyself.

* * * * * * *

I have confided to Gabrielle my first design of living with her at St. Vermont, far from the gaieties aud dissipatious of Paris, devoting ourselves to the welfare of our poor neighbors and trying to ameliorate their fate, which is lamentable enough when their lord resides in the capital, and all they know of him are his exactions. God will not always suffer this state of things; there are already signs of coming vengeance, and this war in America will kindle such a love of liberty here as will not be readily extinguished. Pray God it become not anarchy and brutal liceuse!

Gabrielle received my proposal with au enthusiasm I had never before noticed in her. Her convent education seems to have fitted her specially for the life I had most at heart. Yes, she will move like a good augel amongst the poor, healing their bodily sickuesses with medicines and restoratives, aud pouring into their moral wounds the wiue and oil of her pure faith and touching sympathy. I told her I feared her mother would not be satisfied—her dreams for the future had been more ambitious.

"Nay," she answered, with her usual frankness, "mamma is too well pleased with our engagement to feel disappointed at auythiug you propose, aud papa would quite agree with your views of happiness."

Three days more, and she is mine! Ah, how can I ever make her sufficiently happy? the darling who has so willingly confided her young life to my care. Only three days!

St. Vermont, 24th June.—Midsummer in all its bloom; aud we here in the beautiful country to enjoy it. What peace, what serenity, after the excitement of our marriage! The chequered emotion of separation from Gabrielle's parents—the journey here—the enthusiastic reception of our good people! Gabrielle is delighted; she says it is a new world, much larger and grander than the Paris world of fashiou, of which she merely took a peep!

She thanks God her lot is placed here. Sweet child! she came to me this morning early, her hauds and dress laden with roses still gemmed with dew. "Come with me," she said: "I have gathered these for the altar of our kiud Lord; it is the day of St. John: we will go to church together and thank him—oh, for so much happiuess!" aud tears purer than the dew on the roses stood in her dark eyes, and a flush of joy more brilliant than their lovely color heighteued the beauty of her girlish face. I could only look at her, my heart was too full for words; surely my cup of contentment runs over.

30*th*.—Our sweet retirement ends to-day. De Grandchamps joins us. He has not been well, he says, aud begs us to give him a change of air and a little quiet. He is welcome, and we will nurse him well; but we are so happy I cannot look upon any change with pleasure.

1*st July*.—Certainly the vicomte is much altered, aud my wife sees it as much as I do. I questioned him as to his dejection, but cannot find that he has been playing deeper than usual, and I can think of no other loss that would affect him. A good dose of fresh air, he says, will set him up again. "Yes," I added, "if you do not die of ennui during the process."

3*d*.—Gabrielle looked sad to-day—perhaps I should rather say very serious—for the time since our marriage. When we were alone at night, "Gabrielle," I said, "there is not to be the faintest cloud between us two; tell me what saddens you."

Her old timidity returned, and her color, which varies so perpetually, went and came. I saw she was struggling with her natural shyness, and I waited patiently, holding her hands in mine to encourage her with my love and tenderness.

"M. de Grandchamps tells me you are so very learued, and I am so ignorant. He said—no, he did not say so, but he—— at least I understood him to mean that you would soon be tired of me, that you cared for nothing but science, literature, and—and—all that I don't understand. I saw that he was much surprised that you should ever have thought of me, and so am I now I reflect upon it."

"Dear Gabrielle! thank you for telling me. But I had imagined De Grandchamps far too much of a flatterer for such

"Oh, he interlarded it with compliments, and said he preferred me as I am, but I did not heed all that, because I was struck with the truth of what he first said—that you were so learned, and I so ignorant."

"I am twelve years older than you, Gabrielle, and certainly not twelve years wiser. But I own to a great respect for learning, though not learned myself. Shall we study together? Here, in this quiet place, we shall have leisure for reading."

"Anything with you."

4*th*.—Study with Gabrielle is not a brilliant success as yet; it is difficult to manage. Those stupid old nuns have left untaught the very first laws of everything but embroidery and confectionery, and it is really puzzling to kuow where to begin, so that Gabrielle may understand me. But if I am obliged to own that my wife has no book-learning, I must say that every fresh test proves her more and more intelligent and really wise. She has always done the right thing with the most perfect grace, whilst I have been considering what was expected of me; but as for books, the poor child yawns; it cannot be dissembled, she positively yawns.

I shall be glad when De Grandchamps returns to Paris. He seems quite well now, and is enjoying himself immensely. Strange that he should, so quiet as is our life. . . .

A box from Paris has quite restored my wife's gay smiles. I suppose because it was a remembrance of her mother, for the box seemed to contain nothing but old school-books, working material, etc.

12*th*.—De Grandchamps gone to a friend a few leagues off. I am afraid I am wanting in hospitality, but I really was not sorry to see him ride off, though he may return a day heuce.

14*th*.—What is the meaniug of this? When I went to my wife's boudoir this morniug—always as much mine as her's—I found the door locked; aud when, after some delay, it was opened, her mauner was confused, her face averted from mine. What does it mean? I had vowed to hear of, to practice, no concealment, and yet somehow I could not explain myself—could ask nothiug about the hurried manner, the locked door.

15*th*.—I fancied, after our little discomfort of yesterday, that Gabrielle might be embarrassed, colder, perhaps, but she is not. I never saw her more gay, more playfully kind. And yet she has nothing satisfactory; she has not even reproached me with not demanding the explanation we had agreed to have on every subject of difference, be it ever so slight. And yet she hides——Nonsense, her face is candor itself; she hides nothing. It was a chance, and she has attached uo importauce to it, has not thought of it again. But why lock the door wheu she heard me?

16*th*.—O misery! she conceals something. I saw her to-day hastily snatch some article from her work-basket aud thrust it into her pocket. And yet she carries it off bravely! she is gay, and I—I am wretched—tormented with doubts. To-morrow I will know all—at auy price I will—I know not why I am silent so long; is it fear?

17*th*.—I feigned to go out fishiug this morning and returned almost immediately. I went straight up to Gabrielle's room, but as I approached the door I heard her step within fly across the room and hastily draw the bolt. All calm forsook me—

"Open the door, Gabrielle!"

"Yes, dear, in one moment."

"Instantly, madame!"

The bolt was withdrawu immediately, and Gabrielle stood there with such a look of fearful perplexity in her large eyes; I had called her madame!

"Why did you lock your door?" No answer. "Why did you lock your door?" I repeated, more angrily. Still uo answer.

Gabrielle could uot prevaricate, but I saw that her frighteued looks turned ever to the door of a large closet near the window.

"Give me the key of that closet."

She obeyed tremblingly, but as I put the key iu the lock she rushed forward, and, with a look of most miserable confusion, put her little hands against the door.

"I pray you not to opeu it!"

For all answer, I took both her hands iu one of mine, (they were such baby hands!) and with a jerk of successful rage burst opeu the door. As I did so, there came tumbliug against me the figure of a large waxen doll!! My rival—my skeleton in the closet! It had been sent in that box which had given her so much pleasure—her old convent doll—her playmate for many years! And I had been jealous of that doll, with which my poor little wife of fifteen played on the sly! As I beheld her round, vacant, rosy face, her staring glass eyes, my first impulse was a burst of laughter, quenched almost immediately in a feeliug of such remorseful shame as I hope never to feel again. I had so erred against my most innocent wife that I was ashamed to ask her forgiveuess; every attempt. even, at apology, would be an insult to a spirit so pure—so incapable of a thought, even, of evil. What was I to do? A stifled sob from Gabrielle met my ear. I knelt down and asked her pardon with most sincere humiliation.

"Forgive you," she sobbed, "for what? Will you not despise me forever?"

Her guileless mind had not even understood my insane suspicions; she thought only of her detected childishuess. Glad was I to avail myself of her innocence.

"I have been so rude to you, dearest; I have giveu you pain," I stammered out.

Ah! how much more ashamed was I of my jealousy than she could be of her doll, and how much more ridiculous was I! Dear, dear little Gabrielle!

* * * * * * *

1*st December*.—Gabrielle called me this morning to show me the waxen dolly carefully packed up in a box.

"Do you know for whom I am saving dear old waxy?" she asked, with a smile; a smile which has much, much more in it than the old sunbeam of the childish face six months back.

"And yet, Gabrielle," I auswered, poiuting to some Liliputian needle-work, "yet you are still making doll's clothes."

"For all your learning, you are only a goose!" was the reply.

Fancy Gabrielle laughing at me in the presence of that doll of which she had been so dreadfully ashamed. Certainly something or other has greatly raised her sense of self-importance.

King James, once listening to a Presbyterian preacher who was inveighing furiously against him and his policy, cried out, "For my sake, come down, man, or else speak sense." "I tell thee, O king!"

PICTURES OF NOBODY.

BUT pictures of somebody are, after all, but nothing as compared to pictures of nobody. These are the true criterion by which to gauge comparative success and merit in the world of art. Landseer paints dogs and horses, with what effect a child can see. Painting horses is not nearly so high or remunerative a brauch as painting mayors. Anybody who is a man of genius can paint a horse; but it takes a thoroughly successful aud prosperous mau to paint an ass. So long as Smudge, R. A., confiues himself to Moses receiving the law on Sinai, or to Judith and Holofernes, or some other classical tableaux, his friends admire his wonderful powers, but are well aware that he is not makiug much money. It is quite another thing when they see that he has beeu engaged upon the portly figure of a British tradesman, who has just completed his fiftieth anniversary in the Fishmongers' Company. In the first place, the work is very likely to be presented to the company, and will hang on high, side by side with other illustrious and equally portly figures, iu their banquet-hall. Secondly, it will occupy in the Royal Academy as much space as three living heroes, and attract nearly as much observation. The next company in want of a presentation portrait cannot hesitate to repair to an artist so highly favored, and Mr. Herbert, at work patiently upou his admirable fresco, is not likely to reap so much from a grateful country as Smudge, R. A., may reap auy day by paiutting a Bottom for a successful guild. There is, indeed, every reason why asses' heads should be a lucrative line upon which to enter. It must be unspeakably difficult to keep them all distinct and natural. As a rule, one civic diguitary, to any eye but that of genius, is only too like another. The artist's skill gives them all an individuality that they often fail to secure iu common life, and shows us which is which in flattering and pleasing colors. In the secoud place, the artist's genius not only keeps them distinct, but furnishes each with a look of undisputed majesty. They seem to survey us from the canvas with the solid and serene air of men who have drunk deep of life's honors. To be able to go on sittiug opposite a middle-aged alderman time after time, and drawing him in oils with his expression ou his face shows a command of uerves that is not altogether common. The artist who can do it displays a savoir-faire and a taleut for rising in the world, that is in itself as valuable as artistic talent. It would, however, be a mistake to consider pictures of nobody as exclusively taken from commercial and civic life. Every social circle furuishes them in luxuriant abundance. Omnes eodem cogimur. The Royal Academy catches—all at last. There may be viewed yearly the Hou. Adolphus FitzPlantagenet, as he is seen by the partridges upon the 1st of Septcmber, resplendent with manliness and knickerbockers. Thither arrive yearly the Master Plantagenets with their favorite pouy. There, too, is the Earl (presented by his tenantry to the family,) sitting at his writing-table to compose his pamphlet upon the Coru Laws, with open, intellectual forehead and highly-polished boots. Here youug ladies, about whom everything is commonplace except their scarlet stockings, trip across the snow towards us, smiling as they come. There matrons, fluttering with flounces and with lace, hurl large bouquets of flowers dowu upon us into space. Curates, bland and elegant—a kid glove on one hand, a Bible in the other—summon us to prayers. Bishops bless us gratuitously in lawn. Ladies at the piano sings to us songs of other days. All, with one accord, are bent on showing the public every attention, and seem determined to smile a stranger into good humor. These are the pictures of Nobody, by Smudge, R. A. He hangs them up as his trophies, and as proofs that he has spoiled the Egyptiaus. The Royal Academy has a right to be proud of them—they are the tribute of acknowledgmeut which the unartistic world pays to art. "Nobody" never pays a great artist a higher compliment than when he says to him "Name your price and paint me." The desire to be perpetuated in one shape or another is, probably, common to the species, but it seems to take different forms. The mayors and sheriffs and recorders who figure on our walls may be pardoned if they are over-anxious to hand down to posterity the portraits of obscurity in office. Providence, to save the world much weariness of spirit, almost uniformly blesses the unimportaut with a sense of their own importance. Many a man who never is destined to make a mark on the world around him believes that he has made somethiug of a mark wheu he has sat for his picture to au artist of reputation.

Comical Dogs.—In the life of that remarkable man, Samuel Drew of Cornwall, au amusing account is given of two dogs belonging to his family. He states: Our dairy was uuder a room which was used as a barn, into which the fowls found their way, and, iu scratching among the chaff, scattered dust ou the pans below, to the great annoyance of my mother-in-law. In this a favorite cock of hers was the chief transgressor. One day, in harvest, she went iuto the dairy, followed by our little dog; and, finding dust again on the milk-paus, she exclaimed: "I wish that cock was dead!" Not long after, she being with us in the harvest field, we observed the little dog dragging along the cock, just killed, which, with an air of triumph, he laid at my mother-in-law's feet. She was dreadfully exasperated at the literal fulfilment of her hastily-uttered wish, and snatching a stick from the hedge, attempted to give the dog a beating. The dog, seeing the reception he was likely to meet with, where he evidently expected marks of approbation, left the bird and ran off—she brandishing the stick, aud sayiug in a loud and angry tone, "I'll pay thee for this, by-and-by!" In the eveuing she was about to put her threat into execution, when she found the little dog established in a corner of the room, and the large dog standing over it. Endeavoring to fulfil her intentiou, by first driving off the large dog, he gave her plainly to understand that he was uot at all disposed to relinquish his post. She then sought to get at the suall dog behind the other; but the threatening gesture and fierce growl of the large one apparently proclaimed, "Touch him if you dare," and sufficiently indicated that the attempt would not be a little perilous. The result was that she abandoned the design.—"Our Dumb Companions," by the Rev. T. Jackson, M. A.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "The Californian," office, No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1864.

PROGRESSING.

THE telegraph, which is apt to develop a human tendency to beeome unreliable and ineoherent at the moment when the greatest reliability and coherency is required, has done little else, sinee the election, than unravel at night the fine spun web of the day before. The election in Pennsylvania may be set down at the latest accounts as giving a small Union majority on the home vote, which the returns from the soldiers, scattered through different departments, will probably inerease to ten or fifteen thousand. As these figures seem to lie between the two telegraphic extremes, they are probably nearest the truth. Of more importance than the Pennsylvania contest, however, is the confirmation of the good news from Maryland. There can be now no doubt that she has adopted a new Constitution, whieh, in looseuing the shaekles from her slaves, also dislinks the chain that held her to the Slave oligarehy. Every true patriot will see an abiding promise in this triumph—a victory that is not merely loeal and transitory. The Slave State, whose eapital was dyed with the first Northern blood spilt in the struggle, and who now of her own choiee ranges herself beneath the Free-soil banner, opposes unanswerable rhetoric to the arguments of the Conservative Peace party. There is no "Federal usurpation" in this; no "Abolitionizing," no "Puritan element," except it be the blood of the murdered Massachusetts soldiers striving in the soil. "My Maryland" has made her choice. She had tasted the advantages of slavery. Year after year she had traffieked in flesh under her Constitution; the ægis of her law had protected the master in his barbarities; the statute had provided for the disseveranee of family ties at the will of the master. All this of her own free will she has rejected. We have not yet heard the Democratic explanation of her defeetion; she has offered as yet no apology. To borrow one of the favorite formulas of the Demoeratic party, we might traee this singular chauge to "miseegenation"—not of flesh, but ideas—the eontact and intermarriage of Northern and Southern thought giving truth and legitimaey to the New Constitution.

A PUBLIC PARK.

AT last the principal public square of San Franeiseo—the butt of strangers and the eye-sore of citizens—is to be made decent and respectable. The Supervisors have consented to a reconstruction of the Plaza, and that vagrant municipal fouudling is to have its hair combed and its face washed, and is to be let out for a year to a charitable master. The provision for its support is not exactly munificent nor extravagant; but let us be thankful for what the gods provide. At all events, people will no longer have cause to shun that unlovely waste and its central moustrosity, and Mr. Sanford's economical project—if it be as successfully carried out as his other plans—will at least afford an excuse for further improvement. Any change in the Plaza's present condition would be for the better. Nature has worn such an unpleasant and forbidding exterior within its iron rails that even the brick walls and stone pavements of the city without have grown refreshing by the contrast. It will be some time, of eourse, before the principal features of Mr. Sanford's improvements will become appreciable. Trees do not grow in a day, and the worthy contractor, like all public benefactors, must work, in a measure, for posterity. The young shrubs must be shielded from the vigorous zephyrs and summer austerities of our fine climate; and severe policemen will have to staud between nature and her ardent aud youthful worshippers. But while the subjeet is fresh ou the public lips, and the municipal mind graeiously unbent, it would be well to suggest the propriety of taking some timely aetion in regard to a large and more central park for our growing metropolis. In a few years available ground, which could be purchased cheaply now, will be held at greatly advanced prices. It is ridiculous to suppose that San Franeiseo can do without those breathing-places, which experience demonstrates to be a sanitary as well as an ornamental requirement of every metropolis. It is true that the peculiar soil and location of this city offers very little in the way of natural advantages, and that skilful art and persevering labor must be invoked to produce an oasis in the sandy desert; but for this very reason steps should be taken at once to prepare what must inevitably become a necessity.

SANITARY FUND.—The Executive Committee acknowledge the following further receipts since our last issue: Camanche, $350; Hayward's, $165; St. Ann's Valley, $28 50; Forbestown, $20; Eureka North, $27 50; Forest City, $63 50; Lake City, $101; Santa Rosa, $50 in Legal Tender Notes; San Franeiseo, $795 50 in coin and $32 in Legal Tender Notes. Total, $1,551 in coin and $82 in Legal Tender Notes.

UNBIASED ENGLISH THOUGHT.

THERE has been some talk of reproducing a cheap edition of Punch and other English periodicals in New York simultaneously with their publication in England, and one of the London journals grows quite patronizing and complaeent, over this opportunity by whieh the "North Americans are to profit by the influence of fair aud unbiased English thought"; the same journal contains, by the way, a malignant diatribe on the "Yankee Government," a very studied puff of Gen. Lee, and in another column casually speaking of Hawthorne's book as "abusive." We have had already some experieneo of fair and uubiased English thought. Our whole literature was for a long time drawn directly from England, so that we took in uot only their learning but their prejudices, and indeed a mental Stamp Aet was in full force until steamships sent our question-asking and statistic-searching countrymen into every nook and corner of the continent. In this way many time-honored English beliefs that we had imbibed came to an end; we did not find all Frenchman making a perpetual elaborate dancing-school bow, hat high in air, and French ladies sinking into a responsive courtesy. The frog and fiddle, which was our British brother's formula for gross caricature of his neighbor, we also missed. Our time, however, has come, and we are now the subject of "fair and unbiased English thought," with its due proportion of fair and unbiased English prejudice. Haply we are no longer influenced by either; the nation that cannot yet understaud the distinction between the Democratic party and democratic form of government is hardly the one to whieh we should look for a politieal gospel. Nevertheless, that peculiarly square, healthy and heavy style of English thought, which seems to emulate the English physique, and has a national character, will bo of some service in modifying our peculiarities—our attachment to short cuts—shown by our invention of machinery to save time and do away with distance, our persistent aim at immediate return for every moment of time given to whatever objeet—all these which have become exaggerated into national defects may be benefieally influenced by English essayists and English literature.

A GRAND CARNIVAL OF THE GRAND COMMANDERY.

THE Grand Commandery were out in their grandeur on Tuesday evening, the occasion being the presentation of a sword to the Grand Commander. It was a nice sword, the scabbard made of solid silver and the blade and hilt inlaid with jewels aud gold—just such a carving knife, in fact, as the Grand Commander could "spout" if ever he chanced to get "hard up." And this worshipful individual not being a sword swallower, they gave him a diuner as well—a dinner at the Occidental—such a diuner as only Leland can furnish and "Augnste" eook. The pleasaut and plump gentleman who offieiates in the saloon below was busy from an early hour in the morning until a late hour in the evening opening oysters and clams for the occasion—not common shellfish, understand, but rarities—perfect pearls of oysters—imported from the foreign coast of Oakland espeeially for the Grand Commandery. And "Tom," the gentlemanly and expert concoctor of "cocktails" and other things, nearly shook his elbows out of joint in mixing "appetizers" to prepare the way and make the path straight for dinner. The table was set for sixty, therefore to say that the guests ate "like sixty" would be simply to pronounce a double verity. But to say what they drank like would require the aid of a column of figures—not a solid column, either, but a hollow one, capable of indefinite extension. It was a marvel of good victuals and table ornamentation—flags, flowers, fruit, flutes and trombones. Varying the usual programme somewhat, they had trom-boned turkey; there was also another variation from the common order of things—neither General McDowell nor Frank Pixley "spoke a piece." But for their silence Dr. Woodward fully atoned by a few brief and appropriate remarks about the solar plexus and sciatic nerve. The steward of the dining-room was in his element—if a dress coat may be called an element—and marshalled his boys, terrible as an army with bannisters. The graeeful "James" glided in and out among the guests, his hair trimmed down to the consisteney of good plush, and his lace shining with the consciousness that none but his friends would get much to eat, furtively nipping some favorite Pat or paté when the Grand Commander's back was turned. Several speeches were made, but these not being laid down on the bill of fare, no one paid much attention to them, and the speakers themselves the next morning were wandering around in a vain attempt to learn what they had said. Among the gay and festive faces aronnd the board one recognized the countenances of a few who never got a good square meal before—but that one atoned for all former deficiencies. The cost was a mere trifle—$1,350 42. One of the most pleasant features of the dining room, however, was the face of the host, looking sunbeams upon his guests, and remarking to each in turn that it was a "lovely morning"—adding, to those who showed an idea of "turning in" under the table, that he trusted they would "turn off the gas on retiring." "Jerome" was dimly seen in the back-ground, his head looking out from a meal bag in which he had enveloped it for the occasion. He remarked that the Grand Commander's sword would be a capital thing to spit turkeys on or to have turkeys spit on, and instantly retired to escape a pyramid of jelly that was aimed at him by an indignant mason. All the masons were there in town—i.e., all the free and aecepted masons, exclusive, of eourse, of the married and rejected ones. General Mason occupied an adjoining room, where a free lunch was set for a number of distinguished people who get their regular meals at the hotel, and had an opportunity of seeing how nobly and well the beauties of the coast can perform their part at table.—"Dear mother, I've come home to eat!" The entertainment closed at an early hour in the morning—not at all strange when it is remembered that all went out with the intention of making a night—or at least a Knight Templar—of it. And all found themselves in the morning with their heads level and their shoulders square, as became the prineiples and legends of the Order; and all went home with the firm conviction that Leland and "Auguste" are the representative men of the coast, and the only ones who should be returned to the country in the coming campaign as Presidential electors.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THERE has been but a slim attendance at the Academy of Music during the past week, which even the new opera of La Fiancée failed to bring up to a paying level. Under these circumstances, Mr. Peter Richings has determined to withdraw his troupe, and on Thursday Mr. Maguire announced the closing of the Academy until after the election, excepting the benefit nights, to be indicated hereafter. A good many valid reasons probably impelled Mr. Richings to this aetion, among them a natural indisposition to run the Academy of Music as a personal and private luxury. Keeping a fast horse, a yacht, or newspaper, are trifling and economical amusements compared to that of providing entertainment for the public and paying the bills. The season was unpropitious; the politieal fever was at its height, and would not culminate till after the election; tar-barrels blazing at the corners of the streets kept the galleries empty, and ward and mass meetings demanded the undivided attention of those swains who usually take ladies to the opera. Then there were the Keans, and the sublimities of Shakspearean tragedy—fulfilling the public requirements for both novelty and exeellence, since good tragedy is rarer in San Franeisco than good opera, aud Donizetti, Bellini, Auber and Meyerbeer less frequently murdered than Shakspeare. Against theso difficulties Mr. Richings very wisely ceased to contend, after a short trial and considerable peeuniary loss. We understand it is his intention to leave San Franeisco with his daughter and a majority of the troupe ou the 3d inst. It is believed that a new season could be got up by subscription, if he should see fit to alter his present determination. If not, we lose with regret a troupe that have yielded so much sincere pleasure to all lovers of music, and have been uneqnalled for their arduous labors and unceasing efforts to please. In parting with Miss Richings the public will miss a most charming artiste and accomplished gentlewoman, and lose in Mr. Richings an excellent actor and a liberal, enterprising and gentlemanly manager.

Since writing the abovo, we learn that Mr. Richings will take a farewell benefit at the Academy on Tuesday evening next. The bill will be unusually attractive. The Druidical seene from Norma, the very popular Doctor of Alcantara, and the allegorical tableau of Washington, in which Mr. Richings will personate the Great Patriot, assisted by his daughter as the "Goddess of Liberty," offer a combination of musical and scenic effects. On Wednesday, the basso, Mr. Peakes, will take a benefit.

THE Keans are steadily drawing crowded audienees to the Opera House. The Merchant of Venice was given on Monday night, with Charles Kean as "Shylock," and Mrs. Kean as "Portia." Mr. Kean has achieved nothing more clever and artistic than this personation of Shylock since his engagement. His aeting was original, and stamped his individuality so firmly on the character that few of his audieuce could hereafter read the play without recalling his look and gesture. He interpreted the finer and more subtle delineations of the great dramatist; he was truly "the Jew that Shakspeare drew." Although Mrs. Kean looked somewhat passée for the youthful bride, she speedily made the audience forget her years in the vivacity of her acting; and when she assumed the habiliments of the learned young doctor, by her admirable affectation of jauntiuess and effrontery, really looked the character. Mr. Catheart's "Bassanio" was judicious and correct. Mayo's "Antonio" was very elever and full of promise. Mr. Everett as "Gratiano" was too mechanical and monotonous in his delivery. Barry, barring his continual Barryisms, was a very funny "Gobbo." The Merchant of Venice will be repeated this eveuing, and on Monday King John will be performed for the first time.

TOO MUCH WATER.—A correspondent asks if San Franciseans do not abuse their water privileges—or, to slightly change the figure, ride a free hose to death. Whether the day be hot or cold, dusty or foggy, every morning and evening those peaceful eity swains perform outside their homes on Bensley or Spriug Valley water pipes, often to the discomfort and detriment of passers-by, who may not fancy their liquid strains. He wants to know whether gardens are profited by such an excess of moisture, and asks in what climate vegetation is subjected to half hour showers twice a day. All of which is respeetfully submitted.

THE FIRST BROOM RANGER.

AN OLD STORY WITH A NEW MORAL.

ONCE upon the Cornish strand
Rose a tide so vast and brimming,
That it overflowed the land,
And the hamlet sat a-swimming.

Every cellar was submerged,
Yet the tide kept slowly swelling
Till the waters broke and surged
O'er the threshold of each dwelling.

Then it was an ancient crone,
(True to what tradition taught her,)
Seized her Broom, and, all alone,
Set to sweeping out the water.

Through that ancient female's room
Rolled the mighty ocean past her—
Still the old girl with her broom
Only worked and swept the faster.

When the people gathered round
And in fear and terror sought her,
All of that poor dame they found
Was her BROOM upon the water.

Only with her latest breath
Had she ceased her work gigantic:
Fairly, squarely met her death,
Sweeping out the vast Atlantic.

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

THE ILLUSIONS OF SCIENCE.

THE whole course of nature is a play upon the senses, sounds sights and tastes, dancing upon their respective organs in the most delightful, often deceptive way, not, on this account, at all obnoxious to our sentiment, but quite the reverse; for never did Hudibras' line, "doubtless the pleasure is as great of being cheated as to cheat," have a truer application than to the evidences of the senses. The force of this kind of evidence is usually expressed in the sentence, "Seeing is believing;" yet who believes what he sees without analysis or further investigation into its truth? To accept unsuspectingly such evidence argues a childlike credulity, and reduces the man to the boy, by a process which may be very ingenuous and simple, but not very creditable to the understanding. Not that we underrate the pleasures of the imagination, to which these deceptions of nature are much akin and greatly more tangible and intense to us in their effect. Imagine a scene of soft picturesque character with its misty twilight lingering over the place, its landscape passing into sombre shade, at times relieved by straggling rays of light, exposing to most uncertain view all objects within its limits—such a scene as Thomson in his "Seasons," in sweet descriptive humor, could and did often paint:

> Heavens! what a goodly prospect spreads around,
> Of hills, and dales, and woods, and lawns, and spires,
> And glittering towns, and gilded streams, till all
> The stretching landscape into smoke decays.

Or take one of Hugh Miller's pictures in prose, yet most poetic of them all, in which the vast and rugged prospect, rugged even to abruptness, is made to glow with the fire of a splendid and versatile fancy with much of the mysterious, the supernatural in it: huge heaps of mountains, high rocks, and precipices checkered with shifting tints of light and shade mostly of the subdued gloomy kind, and closely overhanging, in still deeper gloom, the shadowy shore-line:

> "The dusky coasts
> Peopled by shoals of visionary ghosts."

These are the true efforts of imagination springing from things palpable to the senses, not conjured up by mere force of will in the sane mind, or existing in the brain of the madman, by reason of diseased state in the nervous structure.

No enthusiasm ever kindles over the purely intellectual story, however wild, brilliant, even flaming may be the description; but give it a name and place, locate it after the manner of Walter Scott and Miller, and see how the picture throbs with the emotions of surprise, pity, love, pain and pleasure, the vital elements of imagination, the sole parent of an ardent enthusiasm. We mean not the cold, dull feeling of an abstract admiration — this can be seen in all the old mythologies and modern mysticisms—but the warm, generous, ay, enthusiastic glow which distinguishes the picture, for instance, in which God was made Man, and man thereby identified with the scene. Yet the imagination, even in such case and instance, has its part to play, and no unimportant part, throwing a pleasant halo over the whole—maybe not absolutely correct and founded in strict fact—an illusion somewhat, still of use to the intellect, most surely of value to the heart by its charms and attractions for the emotional part of our nature.

We never fail to recall, while in this mood, a scene that once fell upon our sight in the mountains of our own California. Early in the evening, with a friend, we sat facing a mountain range of steep acclivity and broken surface, densely covered with timber and shrubbery, and shrouded in the darkest gloom of a starless night. The inclined surface and slopes had lost their form and rose stiffly before us—a vertical plane or wall of rock, in hue of the deepest black. Everything was obscure, repulsive here—nothing noticeable even on the dim outline of the summit ridge—but with magic suddenness the whole scene is changed; the moon, then at the full, had overcome the barriers beyond, and falling first upon the higher parts, and, in order, upon the lower, as it rose, brought us en rapport again with the scene—restoring to our sight the lost curves and slopes and gorges and trees, but, above all, lending to every point and line of rock, and every branch and fringe and leaf of tree and shrub, a silver film and edging, especially beauteous—strikingly so, because of the accidental grouping into forms of turrets, spires, pyramids and other shapes, unique but of most artistic design.

We started at the sight, and—after a time of silent admiration—sought the reason in the science of optics for this silvery illumination, which, though perfect as an illusion, was real to our senses, and must have some solution.

No philosophy now! Very well; but we will give, in confirmation of our illusion, our pleasure of imagination, if you please, from a letter of Prof. Necker to Sir David Brewster, an account of a similar appearance observed by him in the Swiss Alps. "I now come to the point," writes Mr. Necker, "which you particularly wished me to describe to you; I mean the luminous appearance of trees, shrubs and birds, when seen from the foot of a mountain a little before sunrise. You must conceive the observer placed at the foot of a hill interposed between him and the place where the sun is rising, and thus entirely in the shade; the upper margin of the mountain is covered with woods or detached trees and shrubs, which are projected as dark objects on a very bright and clear sky, except at the place where the sun is just going to rise; for there all the trees and shrubs bordering the margin are entirely—branches, leaves, stem and all—of a pure and brilliant white, appearing extremely bright and luminous. All the minutest details, leaves, twigs, etc., are most delicately preserved, and you would fancy you saw these trees and forests made of the purest silver, with all the skill of the most expert workman. The swallows and other birds flying in those particular spots appear like sparks of the most brilliant white. Now that you are acquainted with the circumstances of the fact I have no doubt you will easily observe it in some part or other of your Scotch hills; it may be, some long heather or furze will play the part of our Alpine forests; and I would advise you to try and place a bee-hive in the required position, and it would perfectly represent our swallows, sparks and stars."

To this beautiful illusion and fine description we will seek to add nothing. TRISMEGISTUS.

NOTES OF MINES AND MINERALOGY.

AQUEOUS VS. IGNEOUS THEORY.—The battle between the partisans of the aqueous and igneous theories, to account for the formation of rocks and minerals, has recently waged more warmly than usual, especially in England, where some lusty blows have been given and taken, and strange to say, the aqueous advocates have become the hotter and, more fiery of the two, indulging much in epithet instead of fact and argument, while the igneous people have remained comparatively cool, though repeatedly and disastrously driven from many a well-fortified point. On the formation of granite, ground of their own selection, they had concentrated their greatest strength in the hope of a successful defence at least, but thus far the result has gone decisively against them. The "argument by questions"—argumentum ad questionem, it might be called— is often very suggestive, and can be employed in skillful hands with great effect.

A Fellow of the Geological Society, after stating the fact that the igneous theory is all but exploded there, uses this style of argument in addressing one of his opponents, in the following manner:

1. What where the conditions of the constituents of the granite masses prior to the melting process?
2. What was the fuel employed?
3. How were the constituent minerals moulded into prisms, rhombs and flakes?
4. How was the silica of the feldspars and the micas kept separate from the quartz?
5. How were the alumina, iron, soda, potash and lime of the micas kept separate, in definite proportions, from those constituting the feldspars?
6. How came the feldspars to contain upwards of 5 per cent., and the micas more than 3 per cent. of water, mineralogically or chemically combined?
7. Will our adversaries inform us where a melted granite can be seen in situ, so that we may go and see such an extraordinary phenomenon?

No answer has yet been attempted to our Fellow's questions.

GOLD IN ENGLAND.—It was for a long time supposed that gold did not exist in the rocks or earth of England's soil in sufficient quantity to pay for its extraction even in that country of cheap labor and materials. But in the last two years the metal Gold has been added to the long list of her products, and in a striking way, for it was found that the old Castle of Carn Dochan, in Wales, was built of quartz blocks containing gold in very considerable quantity. These blocks were traced to their original site, and many mines have since been opened and developed. The skill and energy of the English coal and iron miners, so proverbial to the world, have, under able management and the large capital at hand, been made to tell upon these mines with extraordinary results. What by the Californian miner would be deemed worthless waste, has yielded most profitably by close economy and thorough treatment. Of all the metals, gold was the only one of whose working the English at home knew little or nothing, but not so long, for they rapidly borrowed and tried all improved machinery, wherever found in California and Australia, and sent an able superintendent of one of their largest establishments, a gentleman of note and reputation as an author, into Hungary and other parts of Europe where gold machinery could be seen at work, to report on the best system for their purpose. These measures have been eminently successful, and several of the mines are now giving from 1 to 5 ozs. of gold to the ton of rock.

NEW PROCESS OF AMALGAMATION.—Letters patent have been issued to Messrs. Adams & Worthington, of New York, for a process of amalgamation by which the finely pulverized gold and silver ores are discharged in a shower into an atmosphere of hot vapor of mercury.

This is accomplished in a close chamber or passage-way in which the two substances mingle together in such a manner as to produce a more perfect and a much quicker amalgamation than has been otherwise obtained in practice. The novelty of this process consists in the peculiar manner in which the metal and mercury are brought into contact—by sublimation and condensation—and the merit, in the fact that the contact and therefore amalgamation is not accidental but necessary and inevitable. The principle of this process is not new, but was tested four years ago in California in the presence of the writer and several others, and found to be correct and practicable.

GOTHITE FROM LAKE SUPERIOR.—This mineral, but lately made known to mineralogy, is found, associated with trematite, at the Jackson Iron Mountain, near Marquette, Lake Superior. Some of the specimens have the hyacinth-red color which characterises the variety of gothite called by the Germans "rubing-glimmer." It also occurs in acicular crystals of an almost velvet-black color and lustre, and is occasionally found in distinct trimetric crystals.

NEW BOOKS.—We acknowledge the receipt of the following new books from ROMAN & Co.:

General Orders of the War Department for 1861, '62 and '63. Chronologically arranged, and with an Alphabetical Index to Contents, etc.

This work is almost indispensable to military men, and more especially disbursing officers, who will find there laid down all orders up to the end of December, 1863, bearing upon their duties; and, in these days, when the "Regulations" are no longer a guide on account of the constant changes going on, seriously affecting the old system governing disbursements, it is a necessity. It will be found invaluable for reference, being complete, and embracing every general order issued up to that date.

The Temple of Solomon, embracing the History of its location, building, use and typical signification as understood by Masons and Christians. By Orceneth Fisher, K. J.

The character of this pamphlet is expressed in its title.

In addition to the above we have received from Roman & Co., Hilliard's Life and Campaigns of General McClellan; Boker's Poems of the War; Browning's Dramatis Personæ; Capt. Mayne Reid's Cliff Climbers; and some sketches by Lowell. As these volumes arrived at a late hour, and their merits deserve a more extended notice and extract than our present space will permit, we are obliged to defer them until next week.

POE'S "RAVEN" AGAIN.—An English paper comes to the rescue of Poe, and refutes the charge of plagiarism generally copied in the public press, and reprinted in THE CALIFORNIAN last week. To borrow an ancient witticism, the journal alluded to thus denies the fowl-as-Persian:

Many paragraphs have recently been going the rounds of the newspapers confuting or affirming the statement originally made in the Western Morning News, that Poe was not the author but simply the translator from the Persian of the celebrated poem of "The Raven." We believe that evidences of a very convincing character will shortly arrive from the United States proving that poor Edgar Poe wrote every line of the poem in question. It is acknowledged by the poet's friends that he was smitten with the wild and strange beauty of some of the old Eastern poems, and that he was never tired of perusing them; but he most certainly never copied what he had thus read. His imagination was too fertile to render this at all necessary. The only difficulty with him was the effort, apparently, of fixing his attention for a short time upon a definite task or labor. A morning paper now publishes a fantastic poem, "THE FIRE FIEND, a Nightmare," written by the poet whilst experimenting towards the production of his more famous "Raven." The poem extends to ten verses of six lines each, and has something of the metre and weird thought observable in the disputed production. It is said that Poe considered "The Fire Fiend" incomplete, and that he threw it aside in disgust. Mr. McCready, who forwards the poem, adds further, that the poet, some months afterwards, finding it amongst his papers, sent it in a letter to a friend labelled facetiously, "To be read by firelight at midnight, after thirty drops of laudanum." Poe's mother-in-law assured a friend respecting "The Raven" that he had the idea in his mind for some years, and used frequently to repeat verses of it to her and ask her opinion of them, frequently making alterations and improvements, according to the mood he chanced to be in at the time.

THE Lewiston (Maine) Journal says there are a couple of spinsters in Green—monomaniacs in their way—who have been trying to see how many cats could be multiplied from one pair. They began with one pair when the rebellion broke out, and as the kittens have grown and multiplied, their number now reaches to the alarming sum of 440 cats and kittens.

CALLING THE CHILDREN.

CALLING them "Freddy," and "John," and "Paul!"
As only a mother her children can call;
Musical cadences all through her speech,
That a love so tender alone can teach,
Something so loving, and lingering too,
In the "John," and "Freddy," and "Paul, come, do."
As bidding to her for dinner or rest,
Each one is gathered in turn to her breast.

Then looking them over, as divers do pearls,
Smoothing one's cheeks and another one's curls,
Taking the brown, softed hands in her own,
A whip out of this palm, from that one a stone.
Drawing from pockets of corpulent girth,
With outward remonstrance, with inward mirth,
Potatoes for pop-guns—a bottle of flies—
Twine, balls and whistles, and two dirt-pies.

Redeemed from the soil of the street, and anew
Clothed in fresh aprons, and trowsers too;
Tangles brushed out of the silken floss,
That rings and ripples in golden gloss;
Striving with eager and innocent heed
For mother's approving "Well done, indeed!"
Mother, and Freddy, and Paul, and John,
Make the sweetest picture to look upon.

AN ODD SHAVER.

SOME persous have an unpleasaut way of scenting slang in any expression which seems to have a vulgar savor, and it will therefore be as well to assert at once, that "shaver" in the above title is used in its proper literal sense, and is intended to signify "one who shaves." It was Mr. Halcyon Day who was particularly struck with the oddness of the shaver. Day was a law-student, who lived at number eleventeen Mountain Court, Temple. His rooms were right at the top of the staircase, as high as ever you could go without crashing through the skylight; in fact, you mounted, before you arrived at his door, exactly ninety-five steps, which, as a sardonic person once observed, the architect might just as well have made a hundred while he was about it, if it were only out of compliment to rouud numbers. Day's social positiou was peculiar. He was a law-student, as I have said, and he was a member of the Inns of Court Rifle Volunteers, aud was therefore entitled to call himself a gentleman; for it is the boast of that gallant corps that they are all gentlemen, though a story is told of a certain sergeant or corporal, who, having had the honor of drilling, or helping to drill, that distinguished body of men, and having been accosted by an euvious comrade iu these terms: "I say, Tom, youv'e got a nice corps; they're all gen'l'men in your corps, aiu't they?" is reported to have replied with the characteristic caution of a veteran: "Well, I should say not above 'alf on 'em." The veteran was no doubt influeuced in his reply by recollections of half-crowns giveu or withheld, and therefore his opinion must not be considered unassailable. Even the half-crown test, however, had been enthusiastically responded to by Day; and yet Day was by no means well off; indeed, notwithstanding the assiduity with which he was supposed to be studying the law (in the dining-hall of his Inn,) he was spending all his leisure hours (by which I mean the hours he had to spare from his amusements) in doing that which should procure him the wherewithal to satisfy the demands of hunger, of thirst, of the treasurer or steward of his Inn, of his laundress, of the prevailing fashion in dress, of his idle and expensive inclinations.

Now, the hours at which one is usually at leisure from amusement are from about nine or ten o'clock A. M. to about four or five P. M. During these hours, then, Day was nearly always absent from his chambers; in fact, he was down in the city. What he did there, does not much signify, so long as it was nothing dishonest; he may have swept a crossing, he may have been an accountant, he may have been an actuary, he may have been a secretary; but whatever he was, he was away in the city every day from half-past 9 A.M. until half-past four, five, or half-past five P.M.; and there was his El Dorado whence he obtained every quarter a moderate supply, not of unsightly nuggets, but of likenesses of Her Majesty. Exactly, therefore, as that Temple clock, which, so far as Day was concerned, acted just as little boys we are told should not act—for it was heard, and not seen—struck half-past nine, Day issued forth from his chambers, clean-collared, clean-booted, clean-shaveu; for Day was very particular about his shaving. You see, his hair was red, or, at anyrate, reddish, and a chin upon which the beard has a tendency to be red or reddish, requires more than any other kind of chin the daily visitation of the razor. Leave that kind of chin for but one morning unscraped, and the consequences are ghastly. The particularly white skin which usually accompanies red hair, assumes a sickly appearance in connection with pale red bristles, and an idea is suggested of unwholesome and imperfectly-trimmed pork. Day was sensitively alive to this fact and generally plied his razor every morning, spring and autumn, aummer and winter, with unwearied assiduity. But he was mortal; aud man, being mortal, will sit up too late overuight, will sleep too long in the morning, will neglect even the duty of shaving, and will argue himself into the desired conviction that he doesn't want it. He is especially open to thia conviction iu the winter, when he is short of time, sleepy of head, and cold of hand. Thus it happened that one winter's morning, Day convinced himself, without any difficulty, that he didn't want ahaving that morning. The position of his windows favored the delusion; for they were so constructed and so placed as to admit the smallest possible amount of light; a glance, therefore, iuto his looking-glass was sufficient to assure him, being anxious to believe it, that he didn't want shaving that moruing. There was no particular difference between that morning and another which should make shaving less necessary than at other times; but men are blinded by their own conceit. Day, then, for the first time almost since the young carrots had pushed their heads out through his skin, went out clean-collared, clean-booted, but unshaven. His step was unsteady, his mind uneasy, and his look uncollected, for his conscience smote him; he felt he had consciousness that he looked a guy. He took one hasty glance in a sheet of plate-glass, as he turned to the right down Fleet street, and everythiug was plain to him at ouce; the looking-glass in his dim chambers had beguiled him; his hand had been the truer witness; his chin was stubbly; it did resemble unwholesome, improperly-trimmed pork; he did look a guy. Now, Day had friends of an indolent sort—men who, though always well shaven, never shaved themselves. He had heard them talk in terms of high approval of the barber they employed: he would have shaved you, they said, as the native barbers iu Bengal or Bombay, or any other parts of her Majesty's Indian empire, shave you, iu any attitude you pleased to assume: he would even have shaved you, as those Indian experts are said to shave one, in your sleep. He didn't wring your uose; he didn't place a great greasy palm across your mouth; he didn't push your head back, whilst he removed the hair upon your throat, till you gurgled and gasped for breath. His hand was as light as a woman's; and what is more, he never cut anybody. The only objection—if it were an objectiou—was, that he was very eccentric. He liked to talk, whistle, or sing over his employment; and his employers encouraged him. He used to wait upon his patrons at their own rooms; but his place of business was in Shackle Lane. The red and white ensign jutted from his door to attract public attention, and a large placard, leaning against the door-post, informed passers-by, in white letters upon a black ground, that there was such a thing to be had inside as "clean and easy shaving for 2d." Whether any reduction would be made to any gentleman who would be contented with "uuclean and uneasy shaving," did not appear, nor was Day a mau to bargain upon the subject, so he turned down Shackle Lane, eutered Dobbs's shop, and remarked briefly: "I want just my chin shaved, please.

A little uian, with a pasty face and two eyes like a couple of carbuucles, who was engaged in strapping razors and singing popular songs in a stentorian voice, at once turned towards him, bowed profouudly, and said: "If you'll allow me to finish 'The Captain with the Whiskers,' sir, I'll attend to you immediately: there's ouly one verse left."

"Oh, certainly," replied Day. "I suppose you're Mr. Dobbs."

"Yes, sir, I am, sir," rejoined the other; "your very obedient, sir."

Whereupon Dobbs cleared his throat, finished his song, arranged the shaving cloth upon Day's right shoulder; and as he prepared his lather, commenced a conversation with Day after this fashion:

"Shaved fourteen gentlemeu this morning a'ready, sir, aud they all weut out satisfied; didn't cut one on 'em—not a single scratch."

"Mr. Masou tells me," said Day, "you uever do cut auybody."

"What! Mr. Mason of Spring Court, Temple, sir?"

"Yes, he's a friend of mine."

"Ah, Mr. Mason's a gentleman, sir, a perfect gentleman—compared to some, you know, compared to some," he added, for fear, apparently, of committing himself too far. "I would not cut Mr. Mason's throat, sir, the least bit—not for a gross o' the best razors goin'. He's been very kind to me."

"I should hope," said Day, who began to feel slightly uncomfortable, "you wouldn't cut anybody's."

"Well, I don't know, sir," rejoined the little barber, as he ferociously stirred up the lather to the accompaniment of a roaring sea-song; "some throats looks very temptin'. You see, I set my razors to that edge they'd ruu along from ear to ear without a gentleman's knowin' I was doin' more than taking a pimple off. Theu the attitude's temptin', when a gentleman throws his head back over the top o' the chair (it aint necessary, but some gentlemen will do it,) and shews his Adam's apple drawed quite tight. The position is just opposite to that required for the guilliontine, (as they call it,) and always makes me think o' cuttin' heads off."

"Well, I don't do that," said Day curtly, aud iu a tone which shewed he didn't like the turn of the conversation.

"No, sir," observed the barber with a sinister look, and a curious flash of the carbuncle eyes; "I should say you was too sensible a gentleman for that. But don't you think, sir, we barbers have great power over the gentlemen we shave? If the devil was to come over us (and the devil comes over people wonderful) only just for a second, we might cut a gentleman's head off in a moment."

"Oh, come, that'a all stuff," said Day, feeling nervous and rather alarmed. "Don't talk such infernal nonsense. Shave me, will you?"

"Cert'nly, air," remarked the little barber, and began to apply the lather in so singular a manner that Day became quite scared. He had heard of Dobbs' peculiarities, but he was not quite prepared for what he saw, heard and felt. Dobbs plunged the shaving-brush into the lather, and then advancing to his patient with a cry of "Rule—Bri—tannia," (Day was not aware that the barber liked to sing so uproariously during his work,) "Bri—tannia—rules—the—waves," lathered his upper lip aud the sides of his mouth. He theu took another good dip of the lather, rushed at Day with the brush held out like a weapou, and with a loud shout of "Bri—tons—never, never, never, never—shall be—slaves!" dabbed the soap-suds over his chin and throat, rubbing the brush at the "never, never, never, never," round and round and round and round, in unison with his song, and then looked about him for the razor which would best suit Day's skin. Day in the meanwhile felt very uneasy, and watched the little barber's motious with great anxiety. Dobbs, after trying half a dozen razors upon a hair, appeared dissatisfied with them all, and turning to Day, observed: "You've a very peculiar skin, sir; aud I don't think any of these razors will suit. If you'll excuse me a moment, I think I've one up-stairs which will exactly do your business."

Day assented cheerfully; bnt whether it was the extraordinary leer with which the little barber regarded him, or whether it was the ominous expression he made use of—"do your business"—Day is not himself quite sure. He only knows that for some reason, so soon as the little barber had disappeared up the stairs, a panic seized him, a cold perspiration broke out all over him; he rose from his chair, wiped the soap-suds hurriedly from his face, struck a Vesuvian to light his cigar, bolted ignominiously into Shackle Lane, jumped into the first Hansom he could find, and drove unshaven to the city. He had a faint glimpse of the little barber peering for a moment round the door-post of his shop with a razor of gigantic proportions in his hand, then tearing along in the direction taken by the Hansom, and evidently screaming something at the top morning Day's couscience smote him; he thought he ought at least to call upon Dobbs, inveut some excuse for his sudden exit, and pay the price of "a shave." He thought, however, he would wait until the evening, and approach the shop with caution, for somehow hia heart was full of misgivings and fears of—he hardly knew what. Stealthily, therefore, he approached the barber's, and saw that, though it was quite dark, there was not a single vestige of light in the window. He drew nearer, and observed that the house was entirely closed; the shutters were up at the shop-window, the blinds were down at the other windows, and the whole appearance was that of a dwelling whence the inmates have retired to the prison, the work-house or the grave. Woudering, he turned into the next shop, and inquired of a motherly-looking woman if she knew the reason why Mr. Dobbs' was shut up. The womau, with a face upon which amusement and couceru struggled for predominance, replied: "Mr. Dobbs has gone away."

"Oh, indeed! Cau you tell me where he has gone?"

"Why do you ask, sir?" said she demurely.

"Well," replied Day, "something so odd occurred to me yesterday at his shop that I felt quite anxious about him. Has anything happened to him?"

"Yes, sir; the fact is he has been very queer for a long while, and yesterday he went on so he was obliged to be put away."

"Put away? What do you mean?"

"Well, sir, he kep' on telling everybody that yesterday the devil came to him in the shape of a gentleman with carroty hair," (here she smiled and glauced slily at Day's hair aud whiskers,) "a-wanting to be shaved; and he went up-stairs to get a particular razor which had a charm about it meaning, (as he said, sir,) to do for the Evil One altogether; and when he came down again, the visitor had vanished, leaving a smell of sulphur behind him. And he took on so, running after every one who had red hair with his biggest razor, that they were obliged to take him to the lunatic asylum."

"Thank you," said Day. "I'm very sorry for poor Dobbs." But he departed, muttering: "What a narrow escape!" aud his blood ran cold at the bare recollectiou.

NELSON DRAWN BY DUMAS.—Nelson was at that epoch (1793) 34 years of age, short of stature, pale face, blue eyes, spare hair, and with that aquiliue nose which is peculiar to warriors, and which makes Cæsar aud Conde resemble birds of prey. There is nothing to indicate that at this period Emma Lyonna, as Dumas always calls her, entertained any different opinion to that of her husband as to the "physique" of Nelson; but he, on his side, we are told, left Naples under that thraldom which few appear to have escaped who came within the meshes of the syreu. Nay, our historical romancer would have us believe that it was to cure himself of this hopeless passion that Nelson so exposed himself at Calvi and Tenerifle as to lose an eye at the one and an arm at the other. One thing is certaiu, that the hero was not embellished in person when he appeared in the presence of Lady Hamiltou iu June, 1798. It was really a critical moment with the brave admiral. He had not only allowed the French fleet to slip through his fingers, but he had also left Malta at the mercy of the enemy, and permitted thirty thousand men to be disembarked at Alexandria. He was, further, without provisions or water to continue the pursuit, and some of his ships had beeu damaged in a storiu. Caroliue of Naples was sister to Marie Autoinette, and it is not to be wondered at that she detested the persecutors of the latter; her husband, Ferdinaud, fully shared in her horror of Jacobin license, and, in face of treaties of neutrality, Nelson was allowed to revictual and repair in the States of the two Sicilies. Nelson, who "knew that a great victory could alone save him," quitted Naples, we are also told, more deeply enamoured than ever, and "never, since the invention of powder and the use of great guns, had any naval combat terrified the ocean by so great a disaster." Out of thirteen ships of the line, which constituted the French fleet, two only succeeded in making their escape. Nelson as usual, who fought like a lion, did not come off scatheless. He had been struck on the forehead by a falling yard, and the integumenta, borne down over his only remaining eye, had to be replaced iuto their proper position, and then duly retained there by plasters and bandages. It was in such a plight that the triumphant hero made his reappearance at Naples, but then he was also the victor of the Nile—the conqueror of Aboukir (Abu kir, father of pitch.) Yet we are told, and asked to believe, that so unbounded was the joy experienced at Naples at this victory over the aggressive Republicans that the daughter of Maria Theresa, the haughty sister of the equally haughty Maria Antoinette, spoke to Lady Hamilton in the following terms: "My beloved Emma, in order that I may remain King, and, iu consequence, in order that you shall remain Queen, and that this man shall belong to us, you must belong to him."

A NEW SHAKSPEAREAN EMENDATION.—Burton, iu The Book-Hunter, says: "Without venturing too near to this very turbulent arena, (Shakspearean criticism,) where hard words have lately beeu cast about with much reckless ferocity, I shall just offer one amended reading, because there is something in it quite peculiar and characteristic of its literary birth-place beyoud the Atlantic. The passage commented upon is the wild soliloquy, where Hamlet resolves to try the test of the play, and says:

> 'The devil hath power
> T' assume a pleasant shape; yea, and perhaps
> Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
> As he is very potent with such spirits
> Abuses me to damn me.'

The amended reading stands:

> "As he is very potent with such spirits,
> Abusee me too—damme!"

NAPOLEON'S HABITATIONS.

AFTER the high-perched cell at the military school, came the garret occupied by Bonaparte in the house No. 5 Quai Conti, at a right angle with the Rue de Nevers. This apartment, which received light from a jutting-out window on the roof, is now occupied by a painter; while a marble slab, fixed up at the street-door entrance to the house, chronicles the fact that the great emperor had once lived there. In 1792, Bonaparte lodged at the Hotel de Metz, where he occupied one room, No. 14, on the third floor. He was at that time a captain of artillery, and took his meals at a modest eating-house in the Rue des Petits-Peres, kept by citizen Justat, who supplied his customers with a variety of fish, flesh, and vegetable dishes at six sous or three pence per dish; so that a client who spent one franc for his dinner, was considered a good customer. Now-a-days, a franc would go but little way in procuring a good dinner in Paris. Low as the price of each dish was, Bonaparte generally took but two. One day, in order to pay for his humble meal, he was obliged to pledge his watch at Fauvelet's. This man was the eldest brother of Bourrienne, and he kept a sort of pawnbroker's shop under the name of "National Auction Mart," at Longueville House, on the Place du Carrousel.

In 1794, Bonaparte had risen to be a general of artillery, and then he took up his abode in an ancient house, with four windows abreast in the front, on the left hand when entering the Rue du Mail from the Rue Montmartre. He went to look at the apartments, accompanied by Louis Bonaparte, the future King of Holland, and by Junot, the future Duke d'Abrantes. The name or sign of that house was "Hotel des Droits de l'Homme." Here he took a duodecimo apartment on the fourth floor; and immediately over it, two small rooms, one for his brother Louis, and the other for Junot—the cost for the whole being only seven-and-twenty francs a month, chambres faites, that is, including room-cleaning, bed-making, and boot-cleaning.

It was at this rising period of his military career that Bonaparte declined exchanging his rank of general of artillery for that of general of infantry, with which latter rank the then existing government was desirous of sending him into La Vendée to quell the royalists, who were at that time in full insurrection; and as he promptly refused, he was cancelled from the list of general officers, and deprived of all pay. His savings were soon swallowed up, and then it was for the first time that he bethought of and decided upon leaving Paris, and becoming either an agriculturist or a manufacturer! But Paris had still its charms for him, and thither he returned in 1795, and there he took a small, very cheap furnished lodging, (twenty francs a month,) at No. 19 Rue de la Michodiere, five or six doors from the Boulevard des Italiens. He afterwards removed to the Hotel Mirabeau, in the impasse, or blind alley, du Dauphin, hard by the Tuileries. It was a rickety old smoky house, three stories high, the shops on each side of it being occupied, one by a cook, the other by a perruquier and barber. The rent of the rooms varied from twelve to eighteen francs a month; but the closets, without fireplaces, were let at from six to eight francs a month. Gen. Bonaparte engaged room No. 5, in the fore-part of the house, so that it may be supposed he had to pay the highest price—that is, eighteen francs, or fifteen British shillings per month, for his blind-alley apartment. But it was near the Tuileries, and what did not his "star" hold in store for him? Here, the youthful general made, it is said, and unwittingly, a deep impression on the heart of the citoyenne, Miss Fanchette, the only daughter of old Rouget, the proprietor of the hotel. Citoyen or Citizen Rouget, seeing how the matter stood, resolved upon having the general for his son-in-law, but on the stipulated condition that the latter should give up the army and soldiering, and take the management of the establishment into his own hands. But, alas, how mutable is the course of human affairs! Paris was up in arms; hard fighting was going on in all quarters, and poor Demoiselle Fauchette had her leg broken by an iron ball in the passage St. Roch, close to her father's residence, and amputation was obliged to be performed in the very Hotel Mirabeau, which had been turned into an ambulance, or impromptu hospital. Adieu to Papa Rouget's golden dream of marriage; the dashing young general, wisely thought and reasoned he could not with propriety marry an innkeeper's daughter with a wooden leg. What a misfortune! And the poor man soon found a purchaser for his business, and retired to his native town in Gascony, where he ended his days in quietness, but not till he had heard of his young general, the desired son-in-law of his heart, proclaimed Emperor! But history tells us that Mlle. Fanchette did find a husband at last, and an excellent one, too—a rising young tradesman of the town, who, despite her wooden leg, made her a contented wife and happy mother, while he himself was unto her an exemplary husband. Junot having by chance heard of Fanchette's marriage communicated it to the Emperor, who quickly despatched one of his aides-de-camp to compliment the married couple in his name, and to present them with a magnificent cradle, which concealed a splendid casket, containing twenty bank-notes of one thousand francs each; so that Papa Rouget, who had lived to see his daughter well married and settled for life, exclaimed with heartfelt joy, on seeing the aide-de-camp with the imperial prescuts, and on hearing the imperial message: "Dieu soit loué! Malheur est bon à quelque chose!" (God be praised! Misfortune is good for something!)

To the humble Hotel Mirabeau, in the blind alley, succeeded the splendid Hotel de la Colonnade, in the Rue Neuve des Capucines, still near the Tuileries. Here it was that General Bonaparte, on his appointment of Commander-in-chief of the Army of the Interior, took up his quarters, with his full staff; here it was that he received the visit of Eugene Beauharnais, accompanied by his mother; and here it was that General Bonaparte for the first time in his life saw Josephine.

After his marriage with Josephine, Napoleon took up his residence at the simple but elegant house in the Rue Chantereine, No. 52, which street, after the grand campaign in Italy was over, was rebaptised in his honor Rue de la Victoire, and which name it bears to this day.

The next Napoleon habitations in Paris were palaces, beginning with the Luxembourg, in the Faubourg St. Germain, which Bonaparte, as First Consul, seemed only to walk through on his passage to the long-desired Tuileries; and afterwards, when his mightiness as Emperor began to decline—when his "star" shot lower down, vacillating and bedimmed somewhat on the political horizon—the Elysée; and finally, out of Paris, and away, far away from his beloved France, sa France chérie, Longwood, on the rock of St. Helena.

It was on the 12th December, 1840, at mid-day, that a grand military and civil funeral cortege proceeded from Courbevoie, headed by the Prince de Joinville, to Paris—passed under the Triumphal Arch through the Champs Elysées, over the Place and Bridge Louis XV., before the Chamber of Deputies, round the Champ de Mars, up to the Hotel des Invalides, where the mortal remains of the foremost man of his age, and of many preceding ages, are now forever laid.

It was a bitterly cold and clear frosty day; but thousands and thousands from all parts of France had flocked to see the ceremony—the accomplishment of almost the last testamentary wish of Napoleon I.—that his remains should repose on the banks of the Seine—sur les rives de la Seine.

POMPEII IN 1864.

AFTER having prepared one's mind for a proper contemplation of a city buried eighteen hundred years ago, it is calculated to throw it back to the days of railways and other modern contrivances, to find, at the foot of the descent by which we have to enter the said city, a turn-table, at which we are called upon to pay a sum of rather less than a florin. But once fairly through this obstacle, the sense of the past comes back, and, to an Englishman at least who has only just arrived at Naples, life seems to return into the ancient city of Pompeii; he would feel it quite a natural occurrence if a helmeted, sandal-footed, scantily-dressed individual were to turn the corner of one of the streets at any moment. No longer does a guide lay hold of the disenchanted visitor, and drag him remorselessly from one object to another, but he is left to wander hither or thither at his own will, stopping when he sees fit to watch the careful operations of the workmen, and only asking questions when it pleases him.

The improved system on which the excavations are conducted, too, has corrected at least one erroneous idea with respect to the manner in which the houses of Pompeii were constructed. Instead of being confined to a ground-floor, some of them were built with a floor above, with a verandah looking towards the street. This was the case with the house of Proculus; and in order to give something like a clear idea of what must have happened in a large number of households on that dreadful day when the city was entombed, I will take this man as an example, because we happen to know more about him than about any other Pompeiian.

Proculus was in all probability a rich, certainly an influential, citizen. His name occurs in connection with election matters in more than one place. On the right of the entrance to his house is the inscription Popidium ced, Proculus rogat, which may be freely translated by the inscription on a wall opposite to the room in which I am now writing, "Cox for Finsbury;" not far distant, a partisan of one Sabinus had scrawled, "Sabinum ædilem Procule fac et ille te faciet," an equally free translation of which would be: "O Jones, support Robinson as alderman for Bishopsgate-without, and he will propose thee for Bishopsgate-within."

His house was undergoing repairs when the catastrophe occurred; the painters' pots and the workmen's tools were left scattered about, and a part of the pavement had been taken up. A number of cooking utensils were heaped up in one corner, shewing that the operations of the workmen prevented them from being put in their proper place. Others, containing various articles of food, were simmering on the little stoves. On a bronze dish, in readiness to put in the oven, was a sucking pig; the oven itself being for the present engaged in baking bread; more than seventy loaves in all—the greater part of them weighing about two pounds—have been taken out of one oven. But the pig never entered the oven, nor were the loaves withdrawn until after a sojourn there of nearly eighteen hundred years. They still retain their form, though not their color. The porous cavities in the interior are still distinguishable. Their chemical constitution, however, has undergone a change: if we take a little of the crumb, and rub it between the finger and thumb, it crumbles to powder, and has very much the appearance of coal, the proportion of carbon in the centre being less than in the crust; and the proportion of water, which is 23 per cent. in the crumb, somewhat greater.

They were early risers in the house of Proculus, and the cook had begun his operations by lamplight, in the expectation, that as day had followed night, and night day hitherto, this order of things was eternal. But daylight did not come; the flames poured forth from Vesuvius, and showers of ashes rained down on the city, making it so intensely dark, that fathers cried aloud for their wives, and their wives for their children, from whom they were but a few yards distant, yet could not see, by reason of the darkness—as dense as that which fell on Egypt, and which Moses describes as a darkness that could be felt. Hand in hand, as many as could grope their way towards each other quitted the house, passing on their way a sentinel, who sternly kept his post in his sentry-box, striving as well as he could to keep himself from being choked by the ashes, by holding his hand before his mouth, striving, but in vain, for the ashes continued to fall incessantly, until they filled the box and buried him alive, still holding his weapon in one hand, and with the other covering his mouth and nostrils. There were two persons, however, who were left behind by Proculus and his family: one of these, a woman who stayed to fill her apron with jewels, and who fell in the open court, never to rise again, scattering as she did so the baubles for which she had sacrificed her chances of escape; and the other, a wounded gladiator, who probably occupied a room on the first floor, where he perished, with his arms by his side.

There is, it seems, hardly any risk a woman will not incur to save what she most loves from peril, whether it happens to be her child, her trinkets, or her dog. Indeed, it is said that on the occasion of a long subsequent eruption of the same mountain, the nuns of a religious community nearly suffered themselves to be surrounded by lava, in order that they might save their jams and sweetmeats. It may have been the wife and daughter of Proculus whose bones were discovered lying near each other; the elder having to all appearance yielded up her breath with slight resistance; whereas the younger had evidently struggled convulsively before resigning her young life, as is shown by the models taken by pouring liquid plaster of paris into the moulds formed by the pressure of their bodies on the volcanic ashes. These two were found lying near each other; but in another place were found the skeletons of two young people who had laid down to die folded in each other's arms. Elsewhere were discovered a mother and three children, all buried together in a living grave. Seventeen others perished in a cellar in company. Though the excavations are far from complete, there have been, according to one writer, more than six hundred skeletons discovered already.

As to the objects excavated, they are exceedingly numerous. The most valuable are taken to the Museum in Naples, but a vast number remain in the collection in Pompeii, and every day adds to the number in both places. Of course, the greater part of these are of no intrinsic value whatever; they are interesting as relics of a people, some at least of whom were living at the very time when some of those momentous events were taking place in Palestine which have changed the face of the world. Articles of real worth have, however, been discovered; for example, a lamp made of gold weighing nearly three pounds troy. But Pompeii was not a city in which similar things are likely to be found frequently. The excavations that have been made have been so extensive as to establish that; and if we may judge of the future by the past, there is quite as little prospect of articles made of the precious metals being discovered, as there would be in the case of a place like Worthing, if it met with a similar catastrophe, and the inhabitants had had a few hours to carry away what they considered of most value. The articles most generally found are those used in the kitchens and the shops—bulky matters, of little worth, in the estimation of the terrified owners, but of inestimable value to us of the present generation. It is more likely, too, that these things are genuine, than that such things as rings, ear-rings, brooches, and other small articles of jewelry are, which are sold as such; indeed, the manufacture of these is or has been a regular traffic; and let not any man who has visited the buried city, and bought surreptitiously from one of the excavators a jewel or some other relic of antiquity which the man has turned out before his eyes, imagine that it must have been the property of a Pompeiian; those who plant, know where to dig, and those who sow, where the harvest is to be looked for; and we never saw a Neapolitan, nor, in fact, any other man, who seemed to think there was any harm in supplying a demand, by the substitution of a modern article for the presumed antique. Probably very many of these are manufactured in our own towns, since there are few things they do not make there. A translation from a price-current issued by an English house for (shall we say) facilitating idolatrous worship, describes the beauties of certain images which the aborigines were in the habit of worshipping, in the most glowing language, and at a price ridiculously low, considering the use to which they were to be put.

The excavations are now being made on a scale and with a care which will soon exhaust whatever objects still remain hidden by the ashes. A statuette of Silenus has been discovered quite recently, which is described as possessing great merit. It is about eight inches in height; in its left hand it holds a serpent, which supported a glass vase, incrusted with gold of exquisite workmanship; unfortunately, the vase was broken, and only two fragments have yet been found. Two large and elegant candelabra were also found in the same house, as well as two capacious silver vases. Among the recent discoveries, that which seems to have excited the most interest, is the accidental opening of a spring. The water immediately came bubbling up, clear and sparkling, and inviting everybody who came near to drink of it, which they did, some of them in their enthusiasm swallowing a sufficient quantity to cause them serious personal inconvenience. Several bottles were filled with it, which were sealed as carefully as if it were the very choicest of Lachryma Christi, some of which were despatched to the king of Italy, and others to the Pope and other favored individuals.

GEN. Wrangel recently received from the Times' correspondent in Schleswig-Holstein a letter of introduction from Herr von Bismarck, and professed himself delighted with the honor, etc., asking the correspondent to dinner. After dinner Wrangel took him by the arm, and said, "I shall be happy to present you to Prince Karl," and he did so to the astonishment of the gentleman presented, in these words, "Your Royal Highness, I have the honor to present to you the correspondent of the Times, the same who, for years, has written the infamous articles about Prussian politics." "We must treat him well," said Prince Karl, "and then he will treat us better." The correspondent, all astonishment at such an insult at the table he was invited to, withdrew deeply mortified but in silence.

THE late Sir Boyle Roche, in Ireland, was usually set down as the author of all description of bulls in his time; and he really used to make a great many. He, however, vented some tolerable witticisms, and, in fact, it was pretty generally suspected that the bulls were very often designedly made, to amuse his companions in the Irish House of Commons. One of his puns is worth preserving. It was argued in his presence whether Dante or Milton was the superior poet. "I think," said he, "Horace, a very competent judge of poetry, has decided against Dante long ago." "Horace!" said one of the disputants, expecting a new bull; "when could Horace say any thing about Dante?" "Don't you recollect," replied Sir Boyle, "that he asserts most roundly Dante minor. Ep. I. xvi. 22."

THE motto of the city of Cork arms is "Statio benefida carinis," altered from the malefida of Virgil; and most deservedly, with regard to the harbor of Cork. The city arms are of course commonly adopted for signs to houses of entertainment. But the ingenuity of a sign-painter has, by a happy blunder, made the motto quite appropriate for an eating house, over which his graphic pencil has displayed the arms. He has exhibited it, "Statio benefida carnis," (omitting the central i.) which may be translated "An excellent place for meat."

THE BIRDS.

"I," SANG the soaring lark,
"Carol at morn when sunbeams chase the dark;
The prayer of peasant and the praise of king
Go upward when I sing."

"I," trilled the nightingale,
"Warble when bright stars twinkle o'er the vale;
The smiling dreamer owes the ecstacy
Of sweetest dream to me."

"I," cried the mocking-bird,
"Mimic each song, and chatter the quaint word;
I am alone upon the tropic spray
A glorious orchestra."

"I," chirped the chickadee,
"Twitter when snows lie white upon the lea;
When flowers are dead, I still am on the wing,
Whispering of the spring."

"I," cooed the gentle dove,
"Breathe only songs of truest, fondest love;
No morn—nor night—no sun nor snow is mine:
My mission is divine.

"Ever and everywhere
Tender, impassioned messages I bear;
Some note—some little echo of my songs—
To every heart belongs.

"Each chord of joy and good
Is by the soul of gladness understood,
And woe hugs to its melancholy breast
The minors of unrest.

"Yet we all sing and die,
And none o'er our frail little lives will sigh;
Summer will hear the same, its scents and blooms,
Above our leafy tombs.

"The morn will still be bright,
The glittering stars will lose no ray of light,
White snows will fall, and green leaves flutter on,
The same, when we are gone.

"New songs will fill the groves;
New voices, whispering of other loves;
Young feet will sport upon the willing spray
When we are passed away."

O poet! poet, list!
So shalt thou cease to sing, and not be missed,
In the far future shall be sweeter words,
Warbled by brighter birds.

EMILIE LAWSON.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE GENIUS OF HUMOR.

ONE of these still evenings that recently have thrown such a beautiful benediction over the departing days that, in hot fever, have gone down in the golden waters of the Pacific, I sat alone at the front door-step of my humble residence, that is built a few miles ont of town and close upon the waters of the bay, enjoying myself with a sweet pipe, and playfully summoning up, like Prospero, spirits, in the guise of imaginary topics, out of which to select one that might receive grace by being pleasantly enshrined in the columns of THE CALIFORNIAN.

Pleasantly enshrined, I say in parenthesis, because even a hobgoblin of a paper would look well in the handsome dress of THE CALIFORNIAN's types, and a flibertigibbet of nonseuse would be half-way inclined to sparkle in the reflective light of THE CALIFORNIAN's broad and attractive halls.

Prescott went to a great expense to have his Ferdinand and Isabella printed in superb folio for the delight of himself and friends: aud once, at the Century Club in New York, I heard Washington Irving remark that if he were to attempt to read his own writings in an edition as poorly printed as a cheap edition of Thackeray that he held in his hand, he should begin to wonder whether he himself and the public had not been deceived as to the measure of his ability.

As, however, I was going on to relate, I sat at the front door-step of my little dwelling, quite comfortable after dinner, smoking my dear pipe and summoning up, through its fragrant fumes, shadowy topics on which to discourse, inadvertently I turned my head and, glancing over my left shoulder, beheld, for the first time this month, the new moon.

"That is said to be a sign of good luck," said I audibly, after puffing a volnminous whiff of smoke towards the bay that lay before me like a celestial mirror, as it was.

"So it is to the believer who has good luck," responded a cheerful voice uear me.

Somewhat startled, I blew the fragmentary wraths of smoke, that lingered list'essly in the still atmosphere, from before my face, and discovered sitting at my feet a diminutive object with two legs, two arms, a human head, a png nose, and a very short swallow-tail coat. He was laughing all over. Even his cap, a queer little indescribable thing, seemed inwardly to chuckle with mischief, and his body, if body he had, was enveloped, not in motly indeed, yet in the funniest varieties of whimsicality.

"Well, my little fellow, and who are you and what are you doing here?" I asked laughingly.

"Guess!" he replied with a peculiar twinkle of his merry eyes that seemed to dance in the delicate twilight.

"A Yankee, at all events," I returned.

"Not a bit of it," said he; "although I daily visit New England to inspire my playful protegés, Johu G. Saxe and Oliver Wendell Holmes."

I pinched myself that I was not in a dream, and took three or four puffs at my pipe.

"How old are you?" I then ventured to ask.

"Adam, when he ate of the apple, winked at me—I saw him do it," he replied.

"Humph!" I ejaculated, "you have, then, I presume, seen the interior of an insane asylum?"

"Oh, yes; Tasso would have died in one if it had not been for me," he returned. "I delivered him as he delivered Jerusalem—with myself—with a little genius."

"Well, I must say that, whatever else you are, you are a genius of a singular nature," said I.

"You have guessed me rightly," he responded: "I knew that, although you sometimes resist my influence, you would recognize me in a visible form, and give me welcome with suitable entertainment."

"Oh, that last as a matter of course," I replied, with an uncontrollable inclination to make him my entertainment. "Do I ask impertinently if I request you to stand up and let me see how tall you are?"

He rose deliberately, and gradually I felt myself shrinking and shrinking away, until, as my breath grew fainter and more faint, and myself grew smaller and more nearly infinitesimal, I gasped in a bewilderment of fear that I was actually passing away into an absolute nothing.

Meanwhile he was rising and spreading, pug nose, queer cap, swallow-tail coat and all, into an immensity that, as I shrivelled, still increased, until, finally, at the moment when it appeared that I was about to evaporate into nonentity, he appeared to be swelling, though not disappearing, beyond the ultimate of all that has limit.

One idea alone pervaded me at the final instant, as, apparently, I was passing out of existence, and that idea was that I was disappearing in the delightful influence of the Genius of Good Humor. An irresistible whisper escaped me:

"Dou't you think, sir, that you had better sit down again?"

All around me smiled. How I began to grow large once more! "Do mushrooms feel like this when they are growing?" I wondered. Up I loomed and out I expanded, taller, broader, seeing more definitely, inhaling more copious volumes of the sweet air, distinguishing the dim outlines of the landscape, then the landscape itself. the serene bay, the lights of the distant city, the setting moon, the incomprehensible genius who now again sat at my feet.

Hastily I made what examination I could of my physical formation with my hands, and ascertained that, during the somewhat singular process through which I had just passed. I had neither lost nor gained more than three or four pounds of flesh, at the outside, as they say. I still weighed not far from 160.

"Well, sir," said I, "I intended to invite you into the house; now I shall do nothing of the kind. All out-of-doors, I find, is uot capacious enough for you when you take it upon you to spread yourself."

"That," he returned, "is too often the case with mortal vanity. Humor delights in setting it off."

"True; you are not mortal. I see, and consequently are not, as I supposed, a subject for an insane asylum. Neither, I take it, are you the apparition of one who has been mortal. Well, too, I know, that I am not dreaming. I have already called you a genius with a little g; shall I now call you a Genius with a big one?"

His only response was:

"I it was who inspired Dean Swift to write his couplet concerning tweedledum and tweedledee."

"Indeed!" I exclaimed; "What, then, my good fellow, if you inspire me to write something for this week's CALIFORNIAN?"

"You have me even now in your mind," he replied.

As I saw him rising as though to depart. I was alarmed.

"Hold on," said I, arrestiug him with a motion of my hand. "Don't you think, old friend, that you could leave me without rising to your feet?"

"See!" said he.

And he was gone, but I couldn't see it.

A light whisper was at my ear:

"Tell Localitems of this 'Happening' of the week."

FLY-LEAF.

OUR "Happenings" man is on a "scyugle" this week, which means a fit of indisposition to do anything except stand on the corners these mild afternoons, with hat over one eye hands in pockets, viewing the girls, and giving way to a natural dispos'tion to do anything, except what he should—with a strong tendency to snipe-shooting, in which he is encouraged by Ephe Leonard, and one or two other nice young uen-about-town. who go around fooling people by offering lozenges that are only gun-wads, which they are always charged with. Their pockets contain percussion-caps, wire-cartridges and gun-wads; and they look up for rain, not for the good it will do the country, but the benefit it will be to snipe-shooters. To this pernicious example are the readers of the CALIFORNIAN indebted for no "Happenings" this week.

THE grand total of the amounts expended by Great Britain on her new iron-plated ships for the year ending March 31, 1864, was £4,744,324, which is equivalent in greenbacks to about fifty millions of dollars. This expense, incurred by England in a time of peace, is more than double the sum which our Government has expended on the Monitors in time of war.

MY LAST SERENADE.

I NE'ER had sung before, but still
I trusted Love could give
To weakness strength—e'en to the dead
The power once more to live.

How did I lift my untried voice
Beneath her lattice high!
How did I sing, as I could call
The stars down from the sky!

'T was like—I cannot tell to what,
I did not list to hear—
My soul was wafted in my tones
Unto the loved one near.

I felt the fires of love burn bright—
I cared not for the rest;
I thought that nought on earth could quench
The flame within my breast.

I heard a sound—"Be still my heart!"—
I only warbled on;
I heard the lattice gently raised—
"My dearest, thou art won!"

I upward turned my gaze, and sang
Those heartfelt praises o'er;
She—downward turned the chilling stream,
And on me did it pour.

I shudder while I think of it,
As I did shudder then;
Was ever love, so warmly nursed,
So coldly chilled as then?

It came—a splash upon my head,
Upon my beaver's crown;
It filtered through my Sunday clothes,
And coldly trickled down.

I sang no more—I went away—
I saw my silken vest
Soiled by the liquid that had quenched
The flame within my breast.

To my full heart what poor relief!
How had I changed my pain?
Alas! from fever in the blood
To "water on the brain."

One loves the nightingale; to one
The peacock is most dear;
I know my heart is now not pierced
Alone through eye or ear.

I could have borne her fickle whims
Had she but dropped a hint,
And not above my head let fall
A jug with water in't.

My life is changed. I do not love;
I do not try to sing;
The throbs of heart—youth's fondest hopes—
Have long since taken wing.

But Memory, like a juggler, brings
The past with all its blame,
And shuns the girl I loved, who threw
Cold water on my flame! M.

THE VICKSBURG TOWN CLOCK.—The confirmation of Gen. Smith as a Major-General of Volunteers, reminds me of a little incident in connection with the Vicksburg campaign, which, though perhaps unworthy the dignity of print, will do to fill a letter during a dearth of more interesting news. Smith commanded a division of McClernand's (13th) corps. His line was directly in the rear of the centre of the besieged city, and the court-house was in full view of his headquarters. An artillery officer entered the General's tent one morning after a very severe cannonading all along our lines, to request permission to go to Yazoo river, where our fleet of steamers was lying.

"What time is it?" asked the General, who had not left his cot.

"It's ten minutes to seven," said the artilleryman.

"How do you know it's that late?" inquired the General, a little vexed at the idea of having slumbered so long.

"I can see by the town-clock," replied the artilleryman, referring to the clock of the Vicksburg court-house, which, I may remark just here, furnished the time of day to both armies for more than six weeks.

"What!" exclaimed the General, jumping out of bed. "Have you been shooting all the morniug without hitting that old clock?"

"Yes. sir, couldn't hit it. Tried our best, but couldn't make the shot."

"All right, then. Men who can't hit such a good mark as that can't get any leave of absence from me. You can't go to the river to-day."

Thousands of shot were aimed at the clock. to my certain knowledge. It was the target for at least twenty batteries every day, but was never struck, and is keeping good time to this day, I believe. On entering Vicksburg, on the Fourth of July, my curiosity led me to the cupola of the court-house, to see how near the old ticker had come to annihilation. The pillars abont it, below it, and on each side, had beeu struck and shattered. A large hole had been made in a wall within a foot of it, and fragments of stone and mortar covered the box containing its works. Not less than one hundred shot had struck within ten feet—but it had survived them all; and while Pembertou wrote his lying bulletins in his subterranean headquarters everyday, it stood fearlessly at its post, telling the truth, and chiming out the hours from day to day, and from week to week.

No matter how beautiful the years spent in a stranger land may seem, they are but branches without roots.—De Stael.

LOVE'S REVENGE.—Some years ago a marriage was arranged between Hans Steinman and Marguerite Bluhme. There was no disparity in their condition; Hans was a hunter, and Marguerite's father a laborer. Unhappily the latter, from imprudence or misfortune, became the debtor of a man named Dreihahu, who, being unable to get the money due to him, and having taken a great liking for Marguerite, proposed to cancel the debt, provided the girl's father would break off the marriage with Hans, and give his daughter to him. The bargain was agreed to with the consent of the girl, who probably thought a rich husband was better than a poor one. On the wedding-day Hans forced his way into the house where the festivities were going forward, and invited the bride to dance with him. She was too frightened to consent or refuse, and looked to her husband to know what he wished her to do. He got up and appealed to the company to drive out the intruder, who thereupon raised his gun, and with the butt knocked him down, and then snatched the wreath from the bride's head, and walked away. The marriage, however, was far from being a happy one.

Dreihahn, from motives of jealousy, treated his wife very badly for upward of five years, when a catastrophe occurred which removed her from his power. One Sunday evening, as she was returning from Murzsteg, where she had been to hear mass, she was met by a man at the entrance of a road which wound round the mountain, who remarked to her that she must be very careful, as the rail which guarded the path had been broken away for several yards; this, so far as known, was the last time she was seen alive. Her husband, finding she did not return home, went to seek her, and, supposing that some accident must be the cause, he requested several of his neighbors to go with him. The search lasted two days, until, at last, her body was discovered lying at the foot of a precipice, partly covered with plants, and on her head her wedding-wreath of rosemary, now all crushed and withered. Lying near her was the body of a man, who held the muzzle of a gun in his left hand, and in his right the end of a string, the other end being fastened to the trigger; he had been shot through the heart.

Though greatly changed by time, and more, probably, by mental anxiety, Dreihahu, who had never seen Hans since his wedding-day, had no difficulty in recognizing in the dead man, as he lay before him, weltering in his blood, his wife's young lover.

DRILL FOR SINGLE VOLUNTEERS.—Fall In—Love with some amiable and virtuous young woman on the first opportunity you may have.

Attention—Pay to her, assiduously and respectfully.

Right Face—popping the question, like a man, and she'll accept you.

Quick March—To her parents, and ask their consent

Right Turn—With her to the church, and go through the service of holy matrimony.

Halt—And reflect seriously for a few moments; then determine to devote yourself entirely to your wife.

Right About Face—From the haunts that you frequented when single, and prefer your own home.

Advance Arms—to your young wife when out walking together, and don't let her walk three or four yards behind you.

Break Off—Billiard playing, betting and staying out at night, if you wish to have a happy home.

"I WISH you wouldn't give such short weight for my money," said a customer to a grocer who had an outstanding bill against him. "And I wish you wouldn't give me such long wait for mine," replied the grocer.

FASHION'S JUBILEE HAS COMMENCED.—Balls, banquets and sumptuous entertainments of every description will render the present season the most brilliant ever known in America, and as fragrance is an indispensable element of refined enjoyment, the Extract of the "NIGHT BLOOMING CEREUS," the most delicious perfume ever distilled from a flower, is in universal request. Manufactured by PHALON & SON, New York, and sold by all Druggists.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

QUIET WATERING-PLACES.

WINKLEBEACH.

HAVING been deputed to fill the office of Chief Travelling Explorer and Paid Official Adviser to the Committee of the D. U. Q. W. P. E. Company (Limited,) which initals mean, as you are by this time probably aware, the Discovery-of-Unquestionably-Quiet-Watering-Places-in-England Company (Limited,) I, on their behalf in particular, and in the interests of Society in general, have recently commenced my tour. The following is my report:

Winklebeach, Susex Coast.—Winklebeach, so called from the splendid specimens of the 'Winkle tribe found on its rocks, was recommended to me, as an out-of-the-way spot, by my young friend Shrymper, whose father, it appears, is the owner of some considerable property in the neighborhood.

The Railway has not yet reached Winklebeach. The nearest station is four miles distant. A message by telegraph is unknown. The Times is a luxury: an enterprising general shopkeeper procures an occasional copy of Punch, which he permits to be read in his shop at a half-penny a head, finally presenting it, munificently, to the Mayor and Corporation of the Town. The Mayor is the monopolising baker, the Corporation is represented by the aforesaid enterprising general shopman. The Civil Executive Force consists of one unintelligent policeman, who is under no sort of control, having refused to take any oaths on conscientious principles; he is on and off duty all day and night, taking turn and turn about with himself. The inhabitants chiefly get a livelihood either by lying on their backs on the beach, or walking out to the Downs, and then walking back again. The Elders of the people disappear usually at the early age of one hundred. There is a church, and an Independent chapel. The latter is remarkably Independent, and seldom opens its doors. There are only six houses in any way worthy of the name; numerous thatched cottages; and an ancient hostelrie called "The Old Inn." These particulars having been obtained from Shrymper, I decided that this, of all others, must be the shop for Quiet. Through my humble instrumentality, I foresaw the future Quiet greatness of Winklebeach.

OF THE MEANS OF CONVEYANCE TO WINKLEBEACH.

Monday, July. Extract from Note Book.—The only traveller alighting at the New Station of Swashborough. Nobody cared about taking my ticket. At length, after some trouble, a deaf old lady was summoned from her tea, by a small boy, who was digging potatoes. "Grandmother," cried the lad, "here's 'un wants to give tickuts." His aged relative received the pasteboard, and was returning to her placid meal, when I stopped her by asking, "if I could get a conveyance to Winklebeach."

"Sure," said she, and straightway gave directions to her grandson, who ran off somewhere or other, and in the course of a quarter-of-an-hour returned with something or other, which we will term a vehicle. Such a vehicle! it wasn't a hackney-coach, because it was a bathing-machine, and it wasn't a bathing-machine, because it was a hackney coach. In I got with my portmanteau, and an uneasy time I had of it over the rough half-made roads; for the hackney-bathing-coach-machine had not been fitted with patent springs, and was unprovided with a cushion. I cheered myself with the inspiring thought, that, at all events, the nuisances and annoyances of cockney civilization had not reached Winklebeach, and, despite the fact of my being unable to remain on the seat for more than two consecutive minutes at a time, I was happy, idealizing.

FIRST DAY AT WINKLEBEACH.

4.30 P. M.—Arrived at the Old Inn, Winklebeach, facing a beautiful green leading on to the beach. Clear view of the sea. Everything charming. Not a soul about. Boy wants six shillings for driving me. I appeal to landlady. It appears that he is entitled to ask what he likes, there being a monopoly of fancy bathing coaches in these parts. I pay him. Will I have a room? I will. Facing the sea? By all means. Dinner? Certainly. When? Now, or as quickly as possible. What will I have? What can I have? Oh, anything. Good. Then, let's say lamb. Oh! can't have lamb. No matter: a small leg of mutton. No mutton! No, not to-day, because it's Monday! What, not a chop? Oh yes, in twenty minutes. Chops be it. "Prawns and 'Winkles to follow, o! course?" Of course. Platefuls of these are brought in after dinner. Like Prawns, doat on 'Winkles.

5.30.—I have unpacked, made myself comfortable, and sat down to my chop. The sea-breeze fans me through the open window, and a peppering of sand sprinkles my plate. "The Sea! the Sea! the o-o-pen Sea!" and so forth. Here is quiet: real quiet. How very odd: I heard something like a cheer. Another. I am informed by the waiting-maid that a Cricket-match, Trade v. Gentry, is just being finished. Ah! a gala day, probably. Oh no, there's Cricket everyday about this time of year, and a match once a week. Ahem! Well, that's scarcely a drawback. I hear no more cheers. I will light a cigar and stroll.

7.30.—Not a soul on the beach, save a few fishermen mending their nets. So picturesque! they smoke while thus employed. Pax vobiscum, ye fishermen: go on mending your nets by all means. Pax vo—I can't help fancying that I heard an oath. Another. Another. Their conversation is limited; but seems to consist chiefly of oaths, and objection able terms of endearment. I shall quit the beach.

8 o'clock—In my room! Will have tea? What should I like? Oh, as usual. They bring two plates full of enormous prawns and 'winkles. Shall commence my report of this quiet place for my employers. "Winklebeach is the quietest place in——" Very strange, there must be a quarrel going on outside. In front of my window are assembled I should say, all the inhabitants, mostly fishermen, fisherboys, fisherwomen, of various ages and sizes; some sitting on the low sea-wall, some squatting, some standing—but all, as far as I can gather, talking simultaneously. I ring for the handmaid. I am informed that "there is nothing the matter, they are only talking over the Cricket-match. They always do that." Oh, do they! Then I will slightly modify my report and say, "Winklebeach is, except in one trifling particular, the quietest——" By the way, the Cricket-match was between the Trade and Gentry. By this light I cannot distinguish the Trade from the Gentry; nor does their language materially assist me to discriminate.

8.30.—A great clattering, a shuffling of feet, and a confusion of voices in the room under mine. I ring my bell. Not fire, I hope. Oh dear no, the Cricketers are sitting down to supper. Do they sit down in this manner every night? Oh no, not every night. Thank you. "Winklebeach is, except in one or two trifling particulars, the quietest——"

9.15.—The tinkling of a banjo! It is, there is no doubt about it, it is in the room below. Ha! the burden of a well-known song arises! Can I believe my ears! "Is the Pretty Polly Perkins of Paddington Green." Chorus, everybody trying to mark time with their thick-soled, clumsy feet, each man according to his own idea. "She's as beautiful," etc. I ring my bell. Does this go on every night? No, this does not; man with banjo is a visitor. That's lucky; dropped in by accident, eh? Oh no, he generally comes on a Cricket-match evening. Oh, thank you. "Winklebeach is, except on Cricket-match evenings, when the man with the banjo comes, the quietest——"

10.—Somebody has taken to sing sentimental songs, with much chorus. As the night advances, the songs seem to be all chorus. Some rustic is trying his hand on the banjo. I shall go to bed. The wind has begun to howl.

10.30.—Cricketing Party breaking up. Rain. Cricketing party very noisy. Hail, I should say, judging from the pattering at my window. Stones, as I live! Small stones. Crash! I look out; and am jeered at, perhaps by the miscreant with banjo. Feet scuttling away in all directions. An Englishman's room is his castle. What a cold I shall have to-morrow. I light a candle to write this, and go to bed. How the wind has got up: that reminds me, so have I. To bed. One line more. "Winklebeach is, with the exception of cricketing, supper-parties, and banjos, the quietest——" Puff! Candle out. Bed.

TAKING AN OATH IN INDIA.—A friend of mine, who spent several years in India as an officer in the European and native forces, told me the following curious anecdote; and, as he vouches for its accuracy, I think it worth recording in a corner of "N. & Q." The transaction took place in Secundrabad in 1824, where my friend was stationed at the time with his regiment. An English sergeant-major, who was much respected by the officers and men of the regiment, happened by accident to wound, but not dangerously, by a random shot, a colored native, who was a person of some consequence in the locality. Although it was well known that the affair was purely accidental, the wounded man and his friends raised considerable discussion about it, and insisted on having the offender brought to trial for it, on a charge of having attempted to murder the native. The colonel who commanded the regiment at last consented, and the accused was brought to trial. A padra, (or native,) an individual who combined the character of lawyer, priest, and interpreter, undertook to have the prisoner acquitted, and he was gladly engaged for that purpose. The whole case rested on the single evidence of the injured man, and on the mode of swearing him the padra rested his defence. The manner in which the natives of India are sworn is as follows: A piece of chunam (lime) about the size of a pea, with a piece of leaf called a betel leaf, are given to the witness to chew and swallow, and he is then solemnly warned that if he speaks anything but the truth after swallowing the above, the first time he expectorates afterwards his heart's blood would come up. The padra knew that the natives were strongly impressed with this notion, in fact it is a dogma of their religious belief; but they are quite ignorant that the amalgamation by mastication of the leaf and the chunam with the gastric juice, produces a substance much resembling blood. In the case under notice, the oath was put or administered in the usual manner, and when the witness had swallowed the contents, the padra called on him to expectorate, which he did, when a loud cry was raised in the court that he was a false witness, as the substance resembled blood, and the witness himself became so alarmed that he refused to proceed further in the case, and the sergeant-major was acquitted. My friend at the time was rather startled, but on a subsequent interview with the padra, the latter explained the whole affair, which is, to say the least of it, very curious. I have ascertained since the above was written, that the mode of swearing alluded to is the common mode in India, another Indian officer having told me he saw it administered in all cases where the natives are sworn, in criminal or civil cases.—Notes and Queries.

THE WORD "SUZERAIN."—I regret to find that her Majesty's Ministers have permitted themselves to be led by the newspaper writers to use this word in a sense exactly opposite to its true meaning. Her Majesty is made to style the Sultan the "Snzerain" of the Hospodar; whereas the Hospodar is the Snzerain of the Sultan. Great men and great lawyers had their fingers in this speech. The Lord Chancellor, even, has approved it. There is no authority for whom that very learned lord would have greater respect on this point than the late Charles Butler, joint editor of Coke-Littleton. Mr. Butler, in his Notes on the Germanic Revolution, tells us that in the chain of subinfeudation the King was "Lord Paramount." The great vassals who held under him were "Princes Suzerains;" and those who held of these were the arriere vassals. Thus, the Duke of Normandy was Suzerain, the Duke of Bretagne arriere vassal; the King of France Lord Paramount. Butler is confirmed by Du Cange. Not having access to books at present, I cannot refer you to the page. On the Continent, the true meaning of "Suzerain" is well known. It is only within these few years that the word has been perverted here. Another vulgarism, too, has become general. The Times, an especial offender in the matter of Suzerainty, constantly speaks of a person's "whereabouts," forgetting the words in Macbeth: "Thy very stones prate of my whereabout." A line which a final s would render vulgar and offensive.—Notes and Queries.

THE surgeon of an English ship of war used to prescribe salt water for his patients in all disorders. Having sailed one evening on a party of pleasure he happened by some mischance to be drowned. The captain, who had not heard of the disaster, asked one of the tars that day, if he had heard anything of the doctor. "Yes," answered Jack, "he was drowned last night, in his own medicine chest."

REASONING ANIMALS.

THE odd habits of animals are endless in their variety, and often highly amusing. I once knew a dog that would fly at any one who said "pork" to him. You had but simply to say "pork, Bob," to be immediately seized by the trowsers, and perhaps the leg, and worried. Dogs abominate music, as a rule, and a cornopean will usually set nine dogs out of ten howling fearfully. I have read somewhere of a dog that would rest quietly enough on the rug while its mistress played tune after tune, but the moment she glided into "Annie Laurie" up he would spring, and bark himself almost into a fit, flying up at the performer's arms incessantly, to induce her to cease; the tune changed, he would relapse into his former careless condition. Sporting dogs are often highly peculiar in their habits. I have known dogs that would not hunt for a bad shot; so that Leech's old caricature of the two dogs standing still in the turnip field and proposing to go home and not hunt any longer for such a muff as their master, is not so very wild a caricature. A friend of mine had an old setter who, if he got four or five points at the beginning of the day, and the shooter missed every shot, would sit down on his haunches and howl as though in mortal agony: if another shot was missed after this down would go his tail and away he would trot home, and nothing would induce him to stop. A friend, who had borrowed the dog, once came home in a great perturbation; he had "lost the dog." "Well," quoth my friend, "old Rock is not easily lost in this country. How did it happen?" The shooter explained. "Ah," said my friend, "you missed the first five or six shots, I expect, and the old dog will not stand that. He is safe enough in his kennel, I warrant." And sure enough when they went there was old Rock, who saluted the unlucky gunner with a low growl that caused him to make a speedy retreat. As regards parrots they often do know to some extent what they are saying. I will not quote at full length Simeon's famous story of the parrot-talking-match, where the last bird that was brought into the room, seeing so many cages of parrots, gravely exclaimed, "My G—, what a lot of parrots," and thereby won the prize; but will recount an instance of parrot-humor that happened to myself at Falmouth many years since. I was walking up the hill one day when I heard some one call out behind me, "Hoy." Thinking it was intended for me, I looked round, but, seeing no one behind me, I continued my walk, when "hoy" was repeated louder than before; again I stopped and looked round; not a soul was in sight, and again I continued. "Hoy." Thinking some one was poking fun at me from some secure hiding-place hard by, I did not look round this time, when "hoy, hoy, hoy" was repeated in the most urgent tones. Again I came to a full stop, and looked round completely puzzled, for I could not make out where the rascal was who was thus fooling me, when an uproarious shout of laughter, a downright peal of intense enjoyment, ensued, and, my gaze following the sound, I detected Master Polly hung up in and half hidden by a large shady vine. Seeing he was detected, the rogue cocked his head on one side, and looking at me with a most cunning expression, said, "Sold again! only Polly! sold! sold! sold!! Ha! ha! ha!" and quite disgusted at being chaffed in this way I walked on, followed by shouts of laughter and choice selections of nautical phrases. I have no doubt whatever that although the bird had been unquestionably taught this little amusement, and often practiced it, that he had sufficient sense to connect cause and effect, and to enjoy the embarrassment he created. Correspondence London Paper.

HIRING A COOK.—Mrs. Jones called at Madame Thompson's "Emporium for Female Domestic Household Assistants, and General Agency for Urban and Suburban Families of Gentility," and asked for a cook. Presently was ushered into the reception-room a gorgeously-dressed woman, of masculine proportions, who took a seat upon the sofa by the side of Mrs. Jones, and said:

"You wish a cook, do you?"

Mrs. Jones intimated that her wants were in that direction.

"Well, that's my line: I can do French, Italian or English cooking—anything but Yankee. I can make jellies, Charlotte Russe, pomme de terre, fricandeau, jibbletatu, oyster sauce, maitredotel, a la mode, picanti, and anything you like."

"What wages do you expect for all that?" meekly murmured Mrs. Jones.

"I have been having $18 a month, but things is riz now, so; why I had to give $3 50 a yard for this 'ere silk; and I should say I would have $25—Sundays to myself, and two evenings out of the week."

"Do you perform on the piano?" inquired the lady.

"No, I don't. I never heard that it was wanted in cooking."

"Can you extravasate the antepenultimate of a defunct fowl?"

"What d'ye say?"

"Do you speak Hebrew, so as to teach the children German if they speak French?"

"No."

"You will not do for me; you can go." And her cookship withdrew, with drooping colors.

MISS EDGEWORTH wrote a most witty essay on Irish bulls, in which she is very eager to defend her honest neighbors across the channel from bull-making. She herself, however, appears to have fallen into the practice, which is very contagious, in the following passage in the life of her father—we know not whether in jest or earnest. She tells us in her Memoirs that "The last letter poor Johnson ever wrote, or, I should rather say, dictated, was to my father; it was in his nephew's handwriting, and gives the following account of his death."

A GOOD CHARACTER.—A Maltese offered his services to a dragoman at Alexandria. "Know English well, sir!" said he; "have served many English gentlemen; I'm English subject, sir. I get drunk—get drunk, sir."

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S
ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

ASTHMA, CROUP,
DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,
Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,
DIFFICULT BREATHING,
AND ALL THE
DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

PROCLAMATION.

RESOLUTION No. 3,765.—RESOLVED, That notice of a GENERAL ELECTION for Presidential Electors and Representatives to the Congress of the United States, to be holden on the EIGHTH (8th) DAY OF NOVEMBER, A. D., 1864, be given by posting up at each place of holding election in said city and county, a copy of the Election Proclamation of his Excellency the Governor of the State of California, dated the 26th day of September, 1864, and by inserting the same in the Daily Alta California, a newspaper printed in said city and county, and such other newspapers as may insert the same without charge, for at least ten days before the said eighth day of November, A. D. 1864, which said Proclamation is in the following words and figures, to wit:

ELECTION PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, SACRAMENTO.

Notice is hereby given that a General Election will be held throughout the State of California, on TUESDAY, the EIGHTH DAY of NOVEMBER NEXT, when the following officers are to be elected:

Three Representatives to the Congress of the United States, to be elected in the following manner, viz.:

One Representative in the First Congressional District, comprising the counties of San Diego, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo, Tulare, Monterey, Fresno, Merced, Mariposa, Stanislaus, Santa Clara, Santa Cruz, San Mateo and San Francisco.

One Representative in the Second Congressional District, comprising the counties of Contra Costa, Alameda, San Joaquin, Tuolumne, Mono, Calaveras, Amador, El Dorado, Sacramento, Placer, Nevada and Alpine.

One Representative in the Third Congressional District, comprising the counties of Marin, Sonoma, Napa, Lake, Solano, Yolo, Sutter, Yuba, Sierra, Butte, Plumas, Tehama, Colusa, Mendocino, Humboldt, Trinity, Shasta, Siskiyou, Klamath, Del Norte and Lassen.

There are also to be elected Five Electors of President and Vice President of the United States.

The attention of the Boards of Supervisors in the various counties of this State is directed to Sec. 4 of an Act regulating elections, approved April 20, 1863. (See Statutes of 1863, page 353.)

The attention of all officers of election is directed to an Act regulating elections, approved April 4th, 1864. (See Statutes of 1863–4, page 467.)

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great Seal of the State of California to be affixed.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A TOUCHING STORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BOYHOOD.

IF it please your neighbor to break the sacred calm of night with the snorting of an unholy trombone, it is your duty to put up with his wretched music and your privilege to pity him for the unhappy instinct that moves him to delight in such discordant sounds. I did not always think thus; this consideration for musical amateurs was born of certain disagreeable personal experiences that once followed the development of a like instinct in myself. Now this infidel over the way, who is learning to play on the trombone, and the slowness of whose progress is almost miraculous, goes on with his harrowing work every night, uncursed by me, but tenderly pitied. Ten years ago, for the same offence, I would have set fire to his house. At that time I was a prey to an amateur violinist for two or three weeks, and the sufferings I endured at his hands are inconceivable. He played "Old Dan Tucker," and he never played anything else—but he performed that so badly that he could throw me into fits with it if I were awake, or into a nightmare if I were asleep. As long as he confined himself to "Dan Tucker," though, I bore with him and abstained from violence: but when he projected a fresh outrage, and tried to do "Sweet Home," I went over and burnt him out. My next assailant was a wretch who felt a call to play the clarionet. He only played the scale, however, with his distressing instrument, and I let him run the length of his tether, also; but finally, when he branched out into a ghastly tune, I felt my reason deserting me under the exquisite torture, and I sallied forth and burnt him out likewise. During the next two years I burned out an amateur cornet-player, a bugler, a bassoon-sharp, and a barbarian whose talents ran in the bass-drum line. I would certainly have scorched this trombone man if he had moved into my neighborhood in those days. But as I said before, I leave him to his own destruction now, because I have had experience as an amateur myself, and I feel nothing but compassion for that kind of people. Besides, I have learned that there lies dormant in the souls of all men a penchant for some particular musical instrument, and an unsuspected yearning to learn to play on it, that are bound to wake up and demand attention some day. Therefore, you who rail at such as disturb your slumbers with unsuccessful and demoralizing attempts to subjugate a fiddle, beware! for sooner or later your own time will come. It is customary and popular to curse these amateurs when they wrench you out of a pleasant dream at night with a peculiarly diabolical note, but seeing that we are all made alike, and must all develop a distorted talent for music in the fullness of time, it is not right. I am charitable to my trombone maniac; in a moment of inspiration he fetches a snort, sometimes, that brings me to a sitting posture in bed, broad awake and weltering in a cold perspiration. Perhaps my first thought is that there has been an earthquake; perhaps I hear the trombone, and my next thought is that suicide and the silence of the grave would be a happy release from this nightly agony; perhaps the old instinct comes strong upon me to go after my matches; but my first cool, collected thought is that the trombone man's destiny is upon him, and he is working it out in suffering and tribulation; and I banish from me the unworthy instinct that would prompt me to burn him out.

After a long immunity from the dreadful insanity that moves a man to become a musician in defiance of the will of God that he should confine himself to sawing wood, I finally fell a victim to the instrument they call the Accordeon. At this day I hate that contrivance as fervently as any man can, but at the time I speak of I suddenly acquired a disgusting and idolatrous affection for it. I got one of powerful capacity and learned to play "Auld Lang Syne" on it. It seems to me, now, that I must have been gifted with a sort of inspiration to be enabled, in the state of ignorance in which I then was, to select out of the whole range of musical composition the one solitary tune that sounds vilest and most distressing on the accordeon. I do not suppose there is another tune in the world with which I could have inflicted so much anguish upon my race as I did with that one during my short musical career.

After I had been playing "Lang Syne" about a week, I had the vanity to think I could improve the original melody, and I set about adding some little flourishes and variations to it, but with rather indifferent success, I suppose, as it brought my landlady into my presence with an expression about her of being opposed to such desperate enterprises. Said she, "Do you know any other tune but that, Mr. Twain?" I told her, meekly, that I did not. "Well, then," said she, "stick to it just as it is; don't put any variations to it, because it's rough enough on the boarders the way it is now."

The fact is, it was something more than simply "rough enough" on them; it was altogether too rough; half of them left, and the other half would have followed, but Mrs. Jones saved them by discharging me from the premises.

I only stayed one night at my next lodging-house. Mrs. Smith was after me early in the morning. She said, "You can go, sir; I don't want you here; I have had one of your kind before—a poor lunatic, that played the banjo and danced breakdowns, and jarred the glass all out of the windows; you kept me awake all night, and if you was to do it again I'd take and mash that thing over your head!" I could see that this woman took no delight in music, and I moved to Mrs. Brown's.

For three nights in succession I gave my new neighbors "Auld Lang Syne," plain and unadulterated, save by a few discords that rather improved the general effect than otherwise. But the very first time I tried the variations the boarders mutinied. I never did find anybody that would stand those variations. I was very well satisfied with my efforts in that house, however, and I left it without any regrets; I drove one boarder as mad as a March hare, and another one tried to scalp his mother. I reflected, though, that if I could only have been allowed to give this latter just one more touch of the variations, he would have finished the old woman.

I went to board at Mrs. Murphy's, an Italian lady of many excellent qualities. The very first time I struck up the variations, a haggard, care-worn, cadaverous old man walked into my room and stood beaming upon me a smile of ineffable happiness. Then he placed his hand upon my head, and looking devoutly aloft, he said with feeling unction, and in a voice trembling with emotion, "God bless you, young man! God bless you! for you have done that for me which is beyond all praise. For years I have suffered from an incurable disease, and knowing my doom was sealed and that I must die, I have striven with all my power to resign myself to my fate, but in vain—the love of life was too strong within me. But Heaven bless you, my benefactor! for since I heard you play that tune and those variations, I do not want to live any longer—I am entirely resigned—I am willing to die—I am anxious to die." And then the old man fell upon my neck and wept a flood of happy tears. I was surprised at these things, but I could not help feeling a little proud at what I had done, nor could I help giving the old gentleman a parting blast in the way of some peculiarly lacerating variations as he went out at the door. They doubled him up like a jack-knife, and the next time he left his bed of pain and suffering, he was all right, in a metallic coffin.

My passion for the accordeon finally spent itself and died out, and I was glad when I found myself free from its unwholesome influence. While the fever was upon me, I was a living, breathing calamity wherever I went, and desolation and disaster followed in my wake. I bred discord in families, I crushed the spirits of the light-hearted, I drove the melancholy to despair, I hurried invalids to premature dissolution, and I fear me I disturbed the very dead in their graves. I did incalculable harm and inflicted untold suffering upon my race with my execrable music, and yet to atone for it all, I did but one single blessed act, in making that weary old man willing to go to his long home.

Still, I derived some little benefit from that accordeon, for while I continued to practice on it, I never had to pay any board—landlords were always willing to compromise, on my leaving before the month was up.

Now, I had two objects in view, in writing the foregoing, one of which, was to try and reconcile people to those poor unfortunates who feel that they have a genius for music, and who drive their neighbors crazy every night in trying to develop and cultivate it, and the other was to introduce an admirable story about Little George Washington, who could Not Lie, and the Cherry Tree—or the Apple Tree, I have forgotten now, which, although it was told me only yesterday. And writing such a long and elaborate introductory has caused me to forget the story itself; but it was very touching.

MARK TWAIN.

SANITARY FUND.—The Executive Committee acknowledge the following for the receipts since our last issue: From Camanche, $295 55; Fiddletown, $57; Alleghany, $50; Healdsburg, $51; American Hill, $23; Nebraska, $11; Minnesota, $24 25; Wilmington, $196 in Legal Tender Notes; You Bet, $160 50; St. Helena, $200; Petaluma, $118 50; Pilgrim Landing School, $16 25; other San Francisco contributions, $1,020 67 in coin and $18 in Legal Tender Notes. Total, $2,027 72 in coin and $214 in Legal Tender Notes.

Most of the above contributions are the first results of the formation of the "Soldiers' Aid Societies," which the agents of the California Branch of the Sanitary Commission are actively organizing throughout the State. Over one hundred societies have been already formed, and from the generous patriotism which many of the newly formed organizations already display, San Francisco must soon look to her own activity, lest they be farther advanced in the qualities which are characteristic of loyal citizens and ready sympathizers with those who suffer that we may enjoy the blessings of liberty and good government.

IMPROVEMENTS IN BLASTING.—Much expense and labor are wasted in the ordinary mode of blasting rocks, as all miners know, by the plug being displaced and thrown out of the hole by the force of the explosion, and thereby the effect upon the rock itself greatly if not entirely lost. This accident often happens to the most careful miner in the usual way of working, and no caution seems to be able entirely to prevent it. Mr. D. S. Sutherland, of George street, Westminster, proposes a remedy for this trouble, which in practice has been found eminently successful. He introduces into the bore-hole a cone, either of wood or hollow metal, between the powder and the outer side of the hole. The apex of the cone is outward, and the whole is then filled up with sand, sufficient room only being left for the passage of the fuse. The effect of this cone is that the force of the explosion is much increased, the sand rendering the blowing out of the cone impossible.

Another evil attending blasting in mines is the quantity of smoke produced by the explosion of the gunpowder used, so great as to stop for the time all work till the smoke clears off, involving heavy loss of time in many deep mines, the men being often delayed for twenty minutes or more in underground workings. Trials were recently made in the Welsh slate quarries with the gun-cotton patented and manufactured by Messrs. Prentice & Co., of Stowmarket, England, and it is confidently expected that it will supersede gunpowder for this purpose in consequence of its almost smokeless explosion. The experiments were most interesting and successful.

SOME ITALIAN SKETCHES.

ON HORSEBACK IN ITALY.

THREE o'clock found us at the Villa of Hadrian. We had explored that incomparable ruin, and consecrated it, in the Homeric and Anglo-Saxon manner, by eating and drinking. Some of us sat in the shadow of one of the great walls, fitter for a city than a palace, over which a Nile of ivy, gushing from one narrow source, spread itself in widening inundations. A happy few listened to stories of Bagdad from Mrs. ——, whose silver hair gleamed, a palpable anachronism, like a snow-fall in May, over that ever-youthful face, where the few sadder lines seemed but the signature of Age to a deed of quit-claim and release. Dear Tito, that exemplary traveller who never lost a day, had come back from renewed explorations, convinced by the eloquent custode that Serapeion was the name of an officer in the Prætorian Guard. I was explaining, in addition, that Naumachia, in the Greek tongue, signified a place artificially drained, when the horses were announced.

This put me to reflection. I felt, perhaps, a little as Mazeppa must, when told that his steed was at the door. For several years I had not been on the back of a horse, and was it not more than likely that these mountains might produce a yet more refractory breed of these ferocious animals than common? Who could tell the effect of grazing on a volcanic soil like that hereabout? I had vague recollections that the saddle nullified the laws governing the impulsion of inert bodies, exacerbating the centrifugal forces into a virulent activity, and proportionably narcotizing the centripetal. The phrase ratio proportioned to the squares of the distances impressed me with an awe which explained to me how the laws of nature had been of old personified and worshipped. Meditating these things, I walked with a cheerful aspect to the gate, where my saddled and bridled martyrdom awaited me.

"Eccommi qua!" said Leopoldo, hilariously. "Gentlemen will be good enough to select from the three best beasts in Tivoli."

"Oh, this one will serve me as well any," said I, with an air of indifference, much as I have seen a gentleman help himself inadvertently to the best peach in the dish. I am not more selfish than becomes a Christian of the nineteenth century, but I looked on this as a clear case of tabula in naufragio, and had noticed that the animal in question had that tremulous droop of the lower lip which indicates senility, and the abdication of the wilder propensities Moreover, he was the only one provided with a curb bit, or rather with two huge iron levers which might almost have served Archimedes for his problem. Our saddles were flat cushions covered with leather, brought by years of friction to the highest state of polish. Instead of a pommel, a perpendicular stake, about ten inches high, rose in front, which, in case of a stumble, would save one's brains, at the risk of certain evisceration. Behind, a glary slope invited me constantly to slide over the horse's tail. The selfish prudence of my choice had well-nigh proved the death of me, for this poor old brute, with that anxiety to oblige a forestiero which characterizes everybody here, could never make up his mind which of his four paces, (and he had the rudiments of four—walk, trot, rack and gallop,) would be most agreeable to me. The period of transition is always unpleasant, and it was all transition. He treated me to a hodge-podge of all his several gaits at once. St. Vitus was the only patron saint I could think of. My head jerked one way, my body another, while each of my legs became a pendulum vibrating furiously, one always forward while the other was back, so that I had all the appearance and all the labor of going afoot, and at the same time was humped within an inch of my life. Waterton's alligator was nothing to it; it was like riding a hard-trotting armadillo bare-backed. There is a species of equitation peculiar to our native land, in which a rail from the nearest fence, with no preliminary incantation of Horse and hattock! is converted into a steed, and this alone may stand the comparison. Storg in the meanwhile was triumphantly taking the lead, his trowsers working up very pleasantly above his knees, an insurrectionary movement which I also was unable to suppress in my own. I could bear it no longer.

"Le-e-o-o-p-o-o-o-l-l-l-d-o-o-o!" jolted I.

"Command, lordship!" and we both came to a stop.

"It is necessary that we change horses immediately, or I shall be jelly."

"Certainly, lordship;" and I soon had the pathetic satisfaction of seeing him subjected to all the excruciating experiments that had been tried upon myself. Fiat experimentum in corpore vili, thought his extempore lordship, Christopher Sly, to himself.

* * * * * * *

We dined at a little tavern, with a gilded ball hung out for a sign—a waif, I fancy, from some shipwreck. The landlady was a brisk, amusing little body, who soon informed us that her husband was own cousin to a Senator of the United States. A very elaborate sampler in the parlor, in which an obelisk was wept over by a somewhat costly willow in silver thread, recorded the virtues of the Senator's maternal grandfather and grandmother. After dinner, as we sat smoking our pipes on the piazza, our good hostess brought her little daughter, and made her repeat verses utterly unintelligible, but conjecturally moral, and certainly depressing. Once set a-going, she ran down like an alarm clock. We awaited her subsidence as that of a shower or other inevitable natural phenomenon. More refreshing was the talk of a tall returned Californian, who told us, among other things, that "he should not mind Panahmy's being sunk, ollers providin' there waru't none of our folks onto it when it went down!"

Our landlady's exhibition of her daughter puts me in mind of something similar, yet oddly different, which happened to Storg and me at Palestrina. We happened to praise the beauty of our stout locandiera's little girl. "Ah, she is nothing to her elder sister just married," said the mother. "If you could see her! She is bella, bella, BELLA!" We thought no more of it; but after dinner, the good creature, with no warning but a tap at the door and a humble con permesso, brought her up in all her bravery, and showed her off to us as simply and naturally as if she had been a picture. The girl who was both beautiful and modest, bore it with the dignified aplomb of a statue. She knew we admired her, and liked it, but with the indifference of a rose. There is something very charming, I think, in this wholly unsophisticated consciousness, with no alloy of vanity or coquetry.

A FEW BITS OF ROMAN MOSAIC.

To me the noon silence and solitude of St. Peter's were most impressive, when the sunlight, made visible by the mist of the ever-burning lamps in which it was entangled, hovered under the dome like the holy dove goldenly descending. Very grand, also, is the twilight, when all outlines melt into mysterious vastness, and the arches expand and lose themselves in the deepening shadow. Then, standing in the desert transept, you hear the far-off vespers swell and die like low breathings of the sea on some conjectured shore.

As the sky is supposed to scatter its golden star-pollen once every year in meteoric showers, so the dome of St. Peter's has its annual efflorescence of fire. This illumination is the great show of Papal Rome. Just after sunset I stood upon the Trinita dei Monti and saw the little drops of pale light creeping downward from the cross and trickling over the dome. Then, as the sky darkened behind, it seemed as if the setting sun had lodged upon the horizon and there burned out, the fire still clinging to his massy ribs. And when the change from the silver to the golden illumination came, it was as if the breeze had fanned the embers into flame again.

Bitten with the Anglo-Saxon gad-fly that drives us all to disenchant artifice, and see the springs that fix it on, I walked down to get a nearer look. My next glimpse was from the bridge of Sant' Angelo; but there was no time nor space for pause. Foot-passengers crowding hither and thither, as they heard the shout of Avanti! from the mile of coachmen behind, dragoon-horses curtsying backward just where there were most women and children to be flattened, and the dome drawing all eyes and thoughts the wrong way, made a hubbub to be got out of at any desperate hazard. Besides, one could not help feeling nervously hurried; for it seemed quite plain to everybody that this starry apparition must be as momentary as it was wonderful, and that we should find it vanished when we reached the piazza. But suddenly you stand in front of it, and see the soft travertine of the front suffused with a tremulous, glooming glow, a mildened glory, as if the building breathed, and so transmuted its shadow into soft pulses of light.

After wondering long enough, I went back to the Pincio, and watched it for an hour longer. But I did not wish to see it go out. It seemed better to go home and leave it still trembling, so that I could fancy a kind of permanence in it, and half believe I should find it there again some lucky evening. Before leaving it altogether, I went away to cool my eyes with darkness, and came back several times; and every time it was a new miracle. the more so that it was a human piece of faery-work. Beautiful as fire is in itself, I suspect that part of the pleasure is metaphysical, and that the sense of playing with an element which can be so terrible adds to the zest of the spectacle. And then fire is not the least degraded by it, because it is not utilized. If beauty were in use, the factory would add a grace to the river, and we should turn from the fire-writing on the wall of heaven to look at a message printed by magnetic telegraph. There may be a beauty in the use itself; but utilization is always downward, and it is this feeling that makes Schiller's Pegasus in yoke so universally pleasing. So long as the curse of work clings to man, he will see beauty only in play. The capital of the most frugal commonwealth in the world burns up $5,000 a year in gunpowder, and nobody murmurs. Provident Judas wished to utilize the ointment, but the Teacher would rather that it should be wasted in poem.

The best lesson in æsthetics I ever got, (and, like most good lessons, it fell from the lips of no regular professor,) was from an Irishman on the day the Nymph Cochituate was formally introduced to the people of Boston. I made one with other rustics in the streets, admiring the dignitaries in coaches with as much Christian charity as is consistent with an elbow in the pit of your stomach and a heel on that toe which is your only inheritance from two excellent grandfathers. Among other allegorical phenomena, there came along what I should have called a hay-cart, if I had not known it was a triumphal car, filled with that fairest variety of mortal grass which with us is apt to spindle so soon into a somewhat sapless womanhood. Thirty-odd young maidens in white gowns, with blue sashes and pink wreaths of French crape, represented the United States. (How shall we limit our number, by the way, if ever Utah be admitted?) The ship, the printing press, even the wondrous train of express wagons, and other solid bits of civic fantasy, had left my Hibernian neighbor unmoved. But this brought him down. Turning to me, as the most appreciative public for the moment, with face of as much delight as if his head had been broken, he cried: "Now this is raly beautiful! Totally regardless av expinse!" Methought my shirt-sleeved lecturer on the Beautiful had hit at least one nail full on the head. Voltaire but epigrammatized the same thought when he said: "Le superflu, chose tres-necessaru."

* * * * * * *

It is impossible for a stranger to say who may not beg in Rome. It seems to be a sudden madness that may seize any one at the sight of a foreigner. You see a very respectable-looking person in the street, and it is odds but, as you pass him, his whole figure suddenly dilapidates itself, assuming a tremble of professional weakness, and you hear the everlasting "Qualche cosa per carita?" You are in doubt whether to drop a bajoccho into the next cardinal's hat which offers you its sacred cavity in answer to your salute. You begin to believe that the hat was invented for the sole purpose of engulfing coppers, and that its highest type is the great Trireyno itself, into which the pence of Peter rattle.

But you soon learn to distinguish the established beggars, and to the three professions elsewhere considered liberal you add a fourth for this latitude—mendicancy. Its professors look upon themselves as a kind of guild which ought to be protected by the Government. I fell into talk with a woman who begged of me in the Colosseum. Among other things she complained that the Government did not at all consider the poor.

"Where is the Government that does?" I said.

"Eh gia! Excellency; but this Government lets beggars from the country come into Rome, which is a great injury to the trade of us born Romans. There is Beppo, for example; he is a man of property in his own town, and has a dinner of three courses every day. He has portioned two daughters with three thousand scudi each, and left Rome during the time of the Republic with the rest of the nobility."

At first one is shocked and pained at the exhibition of deformities in the street. But by and by he comes to look upon them with little more emotion than is excited by seeing the tools of any other trade. The melancholy of the beggars is purely a matter of business; and they look upon their maims as Fortunatus purses, which will always give them money. A withered arm they present to you as a highwayman would his pistol; and a goitre is a life-annuity; a St. Vitus' dance is as good as an engagement as prima ballerina at the Apollo; and to have no legs at all is to stand on the best footing with fortune. They are a merry race, on the whole, and quick-witted, like the rest of their countrymen. I believe the regular fee for a beggar is a quattrino, about a quarter of a cent; but they expect more of foreigners. A friend of mine once gave one of these tiny coins to an old woman; she delicately expressed her resentment by exclaiming: "Thanks, signoria. God will reward even you!"

A begging friar came to me one day with a subscription for repairing his convent. "Ah, but I am a heretic," said I. "Undoubtedly," (with a shrug, implying a respectful acknowledgment of a foreigner's right to choose warm and dry lodgings in the other world as well as in this,) "but your money is perfectly orthodox."

Another favorite way of doing nothing is to excavate the Forum. I think the Fanientes like this all the better because it seems a kind of satire upon work, as the witches parody the Christian offices of devotion at their Sabbath. A score or so of old men in voluminous cloaks shift the earth from one side of a large pit to the other, in a manner so leisurely that it is positive repose to look at them. The most bigoted anti-Fourierist might acknowledge this to be attractive industry.

One conscript father trails a small barrow up to another, who stands leaning on a long spade. Arriving, he fumbles for his snuff-box, and offers it deliberately to his friend. Each takes an ample pinch, and both seat themselves to await the result. If one should sneeze he receives the "Felicita" of the other; and, after allowing the titillation to subside, he replies, "Grazia!" Then follows a little conversation, and then they prepare to load. But it occurs to the barrow-driver that this is a good opportunity to fill and light his pipe, and to do so conveniently he needs his barrow to sit upon. He draws a few whiffs, and a little more conversation takes place. The barrow is now ready; but first the wielder of the spade will fill his pipe also. This done, more whiffs and more conversation. Then a spoonful of earth is thrown into the barrow, and it starts on its return. But midway it meets an empty barrow, and both stop to go through the snuff-box ceremonial once more, and to discuss whatever new thing has occurred in the excavation since their last encounter. And so it goes on all day.—Fireside Travels, by James Russell Lowell.

PARISIAN WRETCHEDNESS.—Mr. Jerrold in his Children of Lutetia gives us a glimpse of the character of Parisian poverty in a graphic passage: "There are horrible dens, where the rabbit-skin buyers dry their odoriferous merchandise by their own bedside. Where does the careless visitor think these saltimbanques, these fantoccini directors, these merchants of the four seasons, these proprietors of estaminets for damp feet (curious establishments, to be described presently), these Savoyards, and rag-pickers, and licensed beggars, put a slate (to quote Chatterton) between themselves and the thunder-cloud? Whither will the dregs of the coffee, the broken victuals, the sweepings of splendid staircases—indeed, all the wrecks of to-day's luxury of the English quarter—be carried, before the lords of this English quarter are awake to-morrow? Stealthy men glide about the boulevard cafes late at night, picking up ends of cigars. If there were no abodes of misery in this great city, where would these men lie? The rag-pickers have their quarter, their drinking-shops, their balls, and their societies—not, the reader may be certain, near the splendors of the Rue de Rivoli. The organ-grinders and exhibitors of monkeys and other animals, have a roof in unknown Paris. The 70,000 people who are said to rise in Paris every morning not knowing how they will eat a crust of bread, rise from bed, or straw, or plank—somewhere! Paris includes pickpockets, of juvenile offenders, of lost women, of men steeped to the chin in misery and vice. These have their whereabouts and their habits. Mont St. Hilaire and the Montagne-Sainte-Genevieve have claims to rank with our Seven Dials or Minories—albeit boulevards have been driven past the drinking-cellars—where the rag-picker stupefies himself with a burning spirit he calls camphre, or pepper, or casse-poitrine. Behind the glittering boulevards are hordes of human creatures who live by the strangest industries. Necessity—the mother of invention—has been fertile in expedients in the twelfth arrondissement of Paris. There is the maggot-breeder for the fishermen of the Seine; the money-lender who charges cent. per cent. by lending from sunrise to sunset; the poor reveilleuse, who goes from house to house, through the winter nights, to waken sleepers who must be at the markets; and there is the 'guardian angel,' whose business consists in seeing drunkards home from the wine-shops, at the rate of ten sous per drunkard! Behind all these quaint bread-winners, there are crowds of men and women, who depend on public or private charity."

A NEW VARIETY OF THE BRITISH LION.—A lady and gentleman were disturbed in their slumbers one night last week by the very unpleasant noise of a slight move under the bed. The lady expressed alarm, but her somewhat sleepy caro sposo said, "Oh, it's only one of the dogs;" and putting his hand down by the side of the bed, he called, "Lion, Lion," and his hand being licked, after a moment the pair were satisfied, and they soon slumbered again peacefully. In the morning, however, they found that all their money and jewelry had disappeared, and it was clear that the lick had been a dernier ressort of an ingenious biped concealed under the bed.

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF
Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

NEW BOOKS.

WE are indebted to Roman & Co. for the following recent publications. They were received last week, too late for any further notice than a mere repetition of their titles:

Poems of the War. By George H. Boker. 16mo., pp. 202. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1864.

Most of the war lyrics in this volume are familiar to the general reader, having appeared originally in Eastern journals. With one or two exceptions, however, Mr. Boker's war poetry does not seem to come up to the standard he has himself erected in certain pieces that form a charming addenda to this volume under the title of "Miscellaneous Poems." The battle-songs show more enthusiasm than power—the poet's whole heart is in the struggle, but his intellectual faculties somehow are but imperfect auxiliaries, and he is often hysterical when he means to be simply emotional. There is a good deal of sparring in this volume, but very few straight hits from the shoulder; indeed the trouble with Mr. Boker seems to have arisen from his conscientious desire to be equal to all emergencies, and laureate of all heroic enterprise; but as we have been making History very rapidly during the last few years, and eventful deeds have trodden closely on each other, the poet had no opportunity for deliberation. Though a majority of these pieces are in the Ereles vein, here is a dashiug dragoon song, with a clean disc to its thought and a pleasant ring to its measure:

DRAGOON'S SONG.

Clash, clash goes the sabre against my steed's side,
Kling, kling go the rowels, as onward I ride;
And all my bright harness is living and speaks,
And under my horse-shoes the frosty ground creaks;
I wave my buff glove to the girl whom I love,
Then join my dark squadron, and forward I move.

The foe, all secure, has lain down by his gun;
I'll open his eyelids before the bright sun.
I burst on their pickets; they scatter, they fly;
Too late they awaken—'t is only to die.
Now the torch to their camp; I'll make it a lamp,
As back to my quarters so slowly I tramp.

Kiss, kiss me, my darling! your lover is here.
Nay, kiss off the smoke-stains; keep back that bright tear;
Keep back that bright tear till the day when I come,
To the low wailing fife and deep muffled drum,
With a bullet half through this bosom so true,
To die, as I ought, for my country and you.

But the finest poem in the volume is an Arabian Idyl, the story of "Prince Adeb," who having been in childhood wrongfully despoiled of his inheritance by a relative, and reduced to Bedouin vagabondage, nurses the fire of revenge iu his breast, and takes the first opportunity to gratify his peculiar instinets. Stealing into his enemy's palace at night he surprised him in a drunken slumber, watched over by a beautiful slave. The Prince, profoundly affected by the charms of this guardian angel, lowers his vengeful blade and hesitates to strike. The young girl, equally smitten by the manly beauty of the Prince, pleads for the life of his foe. The Prince compromises with his conscience by running away with the young beauty, who is not averse to his substituting elopement for murder. The description of their flight is very graphic and beautiful:

Shadows cast
From two high-sailing clouds upon the sand
Passed not more noiseless than we two, as one,
Glided beneath the moonlight, till I smelt
The fragrance of the stables. As I slid
The wide doors open, with a sudden bound
Uprose the startled horses; but they stood
Still as the man who in a foreign land
Hears his strange language, when my Desert call,
As low and plaintive as the nested dove's,
Fell on their listening ears. From stall to stall,
Feeling the horses with my groping hands,
I crept in darkness; and at length I came Upon two sister mares whose rounded sides,
Fine muzzles, and small heads, and pointed ears,
And foreheads spreading 'twixt their eyelids wide,
Long slender tails, thin manes, and coats of silk,
Told me, that, of the hundred steeds there stalled,
My hand was on the treasures. O'er and o'er
I felt their bony joints and down their legs
To the cool hoofs;—no blemish anywhere:
These I led forth and saddled.

Dramatis Personæ. By Robert Browning. 16mo., pp. 362. Boston: Tieknor & Fields. 1864.

Every admirer of Robert Browning will admit the felicity of this title of his latest work, and find therein some definition of the faults and virtues of his peculiar genius. No other modern writer of verse can compare with him in dramatic vigor, intensity and force of condensatiou; yet his dispositiou to forget his own individuality in that of the character he depicts, and to thus lose that certain control over his creation which is necessary for perspicuity and clearness, will prevent him from ever rivalling Tennyson as a poet. Mr. Browning's faults are simply exaggeration of his excellences, which often render him obseure to the general reader; and we frankly confess, while owning sincere admiration for his genius, that we are unable to pass a criticism upon two-thirds of his present volume through sheer inability to understand it. "A Death in the Desert," "Caliban upon Setebos," "Abt Vogler," "Rabbi Beu Ezra," and "James Lee," are of the complexion of Sordello, and remind us of the old story of Jerrold, and his perturbation on perusing that unintelligible poem. Exiled to a quiet country village, and forbidden all books and literary occupation in consequence of alarming symptoms of brain disease, Jerrold managed, through the incautiousness of his wife, to get hold of a copy of Sordello, just published. He eagerly opened the volume, but page after page was turned, and line after line perused, without awakening a consecutive thought. An ill-defined horror seized upon the unfortunate satirist. Rushing to his wife, he tremblingly placed the book in her hands, and bade her read it and give him her opinion of its merits. Mrs. Jerrold turned to the first page, and Jerrold eagerly watched the contraction of her brows as she murmured the lines half-aloud. At length, looking up, she said: "Why, Jerrold, I can't make head or tail of it!" "Thank God!" ejaculated her relieved husband. "Then I'm not crazy!"

"Mr. Sludge, the Medium," is a marvellously graphic and analytical exposure of the tricks of spiritualism and the weakness of spiritualists, as given by a crafty medium "upon compulsion." Says Sludge:

Then, it 's so cruel easy! O, those tricks
That can't be tricks, those feats by sleight of hand,
Clearly no common conjurer's!—no, indeed!
A conjurer? Choose me any craft in the world
A man put's hand to; and with six months' pains,
I'd play you twenty tricks miraculous
To people untaught the trade: have you seen glass blown,
Pipes pierced? Why, just this biscuit that I chip,
Did you ever watch a baker toss one flat
To the oven? Try and do it! Take my word,
Practice but half as much, while limbs are lithe,
To turn, shove, tilt a table, crack your joints,
Manage your feet, dispose your hands aright,
Work wires that twitch the curtains, play the glevo
At end of your slipper—then put out the lights
And——there, there, all you want you'll get, I hope!
I found it slip, easy as an old shoe.

Mr. Sludge does not spare the little superstitious foibles of the class he preyed upon so successfully. Hear him:

Well, I add one use
To all the acknowledged uses, and declare
If I spy Charles's Wain at twelve to-night,
It warns me, "Go, nor lose another day,
And have your hair cut, Sludge!" You laugh: and why?
Were such a sign too hard for God to give?
No: but Sludge seems too little for such grace!
Thank you, sir! So you think, so does Sludge!
When you and good men gape at Providence,
Go into history and bid us mark
Not merely powder-plots prevented, crowns
Kept on kings' heads by miracle enough,
But private mercies—O, you 've told me, sir,
Of such interpositions! How, yourself,
Once, missing, on a memorable day,
Your handkerchief—just setting out, you knew—
You must return to fetch it, lost the train,
And saved your precious self from what befel
The thirty-three whom Providence forgot.
You tell, and ask me what I think of this?
Well, sir, I think then, since you needs must know,
What matter had you and Boston city to boot
Sailed skyward, like burnt onion-peelings! Much
To you, no doubt: for me—undoubtedly
The cutting of my hair concerns me more,
Because, however sad the truth may seem,
Sludge is of all-importance to himself.

We close the volume with the following vivid and dramatic little episode, thoroughly characteristic of Mr. Browning's clearest style:

YOUTH AND ART.

It once might have been, once only:
We lodged in a street together,
You a sparrow on the housetop lonely,
I, a lone she-bird of his feather.

Your trade was with sticks and clay,
You thumbed, thrust, patted, and polished,
Then laughed: "They will see some day
Smith made, and Gibson demolished."

My business was song, song, song;
I chirped, cheeped, trilled, and twittered,
"Kate Brown 's on the boards ere long,
And Grisi's existence embittered!"

I earned no more by a warble
Than you by a sketch in plaster;
You wanted a piece of marble,
I needed a music-master.

We studied hard in our styles,
Chipped each at a crust like Hindoos,
For air, looked out on the tiles,
For fun, watched each other's windows.

You lounged, like a boy of the South,
Cap and blouse—nay, a bit of beard too;
Or you got it, rubbing your mouth
With fingers the clay adhered to.

And I—soon managed to find
Weak points in the flower-fence facing,
Was forced to put up a blind
And be safe in my corset-lacing.

No harm! It was not my fault
If you never turned your eyes' tail up,
As I shook upon E in alt.,
Or ran the chromatic scale up:

For spring bade the sparrows pair,
And the boys and girls gave guesses,
And stalls in our street looked rare
With bulrush and watercresses.

Why did not you pinch a flower
In a pellet of clay and fling it?
Why did not I put a power
Of thanks in a look, or sing it?

I did look, sharp as a lynx,
(And yet the memory rankles,)
When models arrived, some minx
Tripped up-stairs, she and her ankles.

But I think I gave you as good!
"That foreign fellow—who can know
How she pays, in a playful mood,
For his tuning her that piano?"

Could you say so, and never say,
"Suppose we join hands and fortunes,
And I fetch her from over the way,
Her, piano, and long tunes and short tunes?"

No, no: you would not be rash,
Nor I rasher and something over:
You 've to settle yet Gibson's hash,
And Grisi yet lives in clover.

But you meet the Prince at the Board,
I'm queen myself at bals-paré,
I've married a rich old lord,
And you're dubbed knight and an R. A.

Each life 's unfulfilled, you see;
It hangs still, patchy and scrappy:
We have not sighed deep, laughed free,
Starved, feasted, despaired—been happy.

And nobody calls you a dunce,
And people suppose me clever:
This could but have happened once,
And we missed it, lost it forever.

Fireside Travels. By James Russell Lowell. 16mo., pp. 324. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1864.

A charming book for the fireside, to be read from the depths of an easy chair, to the accompaniment of rain splashing on the windows and the crackling "of a sea-coal fire" or any other influences that induce comfortable retrospection. Some of these sketches were published in Putnam's Magaziue, when that excellent but now defunct periodical was in the growth of its popularity. The Italian outlines, and "A Few Bits of Roman Mosaic," are here printed for the first time. They are fine specimens of Mr. Lowell's prose, elegant and graceful, with here and there felicitous touches that resemble the "Autocrat's" finest pages. Although we have already given some extracts in another part of this paper, we are strongly tempted to reproduce the followiug original view of that somewhat depressing and often described pheuomena of

A CALM AT SEA.

I know nothing so tedious at once and exasperating as that regular slap of the wilted sails when the ship rises and falls with the slow breathing of the sleeping sea, one greasy, brassy swell following another, slow, smooth, immitigable as the series of Wordsworth's "Ecclesiastical Sonnets." Even at his best, Neptune, in a tete-a-tete, has a way of repeating himself, an obtuseness to the ne quid nimis, that is stupefying. It reminds me of organ-music and my good friend Sebastian Bach. A fugue or two will do very well; but a concert made up of nothing else is altogether too epic for me. There is nothing so desperately monotonous as the sea, and I no louger wonder at the cruelty of pirates. Fancy an existence in which the coming up of a clumsy finback whale, who says Pooh! to you solemnly as you lean over the taffrail, is an event as exciting as an election on shore! The dampuess seems to strike into the wits as into the lucifer-matches, so that one may scratch a thought half a dozen times and get nothing at last but a faint sputter, the forlorn hope of fire, which only goes far enough to leave a sense of suffocation behiud it. Even smoking becomes an employment instead of a solace. Who less likely to come to their wit's end than W. M. T. and A. H. C.? Yet I have seeu them driven to five meals a day for mental occupation. I sometimes sit and pity Noah; but even he had this advantage over all succeeding navigators, that, wherever he landed, he was sure to get no ill news from home. He should be canonized as the patron-saint of newspaper correspondents, being the only man who ever had the very last autheutic intelligence from everywhere.

The finback whale recorded just above has much the look of a brown-paper parcel,—the whitish stripes that run across him answering for the pack-thread. He has a kind of accidental hole in the top of his head, through which he pooh-poohs the rest of creation, and which looks as if it had been made by the chance thrust of a chestnut rail. He was our first event. Our second was harpooning a sunfish, which basked doziug on the lap of the sea, looking so much like the giant turtle of an alderman's dream, that I am persuaded he would have made mock-turtle soup rather than acknowledge his imposture. But he broke away just as they were hauling him over the side, and sank placidly through the clear water, leaving behind him a crimson trail that wavered a moment and was goue.

The sea, though, has better sights than these. When we were up with the Azores, we began to meet flying-fish and Portuguese men-of-war beautiful as the galley of Cleopatra, tiny craft that dared these seas before Columbus. I have seen one of the former rise from the crest of a wave, and, glancing from another some two hundred feet beyond, take a fresh flight of perhaps as long. How Calderon would have similized this pretty creature had he ever seen it! How would he have run him up and down the gamut of simile! If a fish, then a fish with wings; if a bird, then a bird with fins; and so on, keeping up the poor shuttle-cock of a conceit as is his wont. Indeed, the poor thing is the most killing bait for a comparison, and I assure you I have three or four iu my inkstand;—but be calm, they shall stay there. Moore, who looked on all nature as a kind of Gradus ad Parnassum, a thesaurus of similitude, and spent his life in a game of What is my thought like? with himself, did the flying-fish on his way to Bermuda. So I leave him in peace.

Life and Campaigns of George B. McClellan, Major-General, U. S. A. By G. S. Hilliard. pp. 396.

The purpose of this work is distinctly stated by the author "To exhibit Gen. McClellan's title to the gratitude and admiration of his countrymeu, by simply telling them what he has done. The treatment he has received has made it indeed uecessary to sometimes take the attitude of controversy, and to assail others in order to do him justice." As we do not propose to treat of this book in this column, except in regard to its literary merits, we can only say that the well-known and scholarly style of Mr. Hilliard will insure its perusal from friends and foes.

DENSITY OF ZIRCON.—In a recent number of the Comptes Rendus is contained the abstract of a paper read before a late meeting of the Academy by M. A. Damour, who considers the wide variation in hardness and density, for which this mineral species is remarkable, to be due, not to differences in chemical composition, but to certain varying molecular conditions. The objections to this hypothesis are obvious to all mineralogists, and it will reqnire much stronger proofs than M. Damour has yet brought forward to secure its aeceptance by scientific men. The theory of M. Gustave Rose, that zircon, instead of being a silicate of zirconia, is really an isomorphous compound of silicic aeid and zirconic acid, seems certainly preferable, for it accounts for the varying hardness and gravity of the mineral by the varying proportions it contains of the two iso-morphous acids—the heavier and harder specimens contaiuing the more zirconic acid.

DEMON AMOR.

[TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN FOR "THE CALIFORNIAN."]

CONCLUSION.

WHEN on the following morning Udo awoke, what was his astonishment at finding himself no more in the shipper's hut, but in a royal apartment, adorned with costly furniture! His couch was a magnificent throne bed: the morning sun was playing softly through the high windows with many colored glass, and its beneficent rays seemed to give a new life to his weary soul. At his lightest motion a number of well-dressed servants entered, awaiting in respectful silence his commands.

The first thing he asked them was, naturally, where he was, how he came into this palace, and who was the owner.

They answered that "he was in the city of Gedan, [the old name of Dantzic, hence the Latin name, Gedanam,] on the Vistula, in the royal residence, and that the sovereign was Waidemuth the Powerful.

Udo was amazed to have found a friend and ally in the King of the Amber coast, of whom he had heard so many marvellous things; but he never could have dreamed that the juggler, Waidemuth, to whom he had given hospitality, was this very monarch himself. Scarce had he recovered from his surprise, when the king, adorned in regal costume, entered to welcome his guest, and tenderly pressed him to his heart.

"My brother," said he, "you are here in your own dwelling. I am but too happy to have the occasion of reciprocating the friendship I received at your hands."

Udo was not a little confused: he was received as a prince by the king whom he himself had treated as a poor private person: he did not fail to excuse this breach of etiquette with the strict incog. which his Highness had observed. In order to drive away the melancholy of his guest and to divert his attention, Waidemuth explained to him all that the prince in vain tried to know.

"I went," said he, "to study mankind, to observe the manners and habits of foreign nations, and (to speak the truth) to see the daughters of the country with a view to choose a wife. Elfrida, the daughter of the King of the East Angles, in Britain, had often been held up to me as a paragon of beauty and virtue.

"I equipped a vessel to take me over with my retinue and the gifts which I intended to offer to the princess: for myself I needed no vessel. I have a means of traveling far more secure and convenient. The storm which overtook me in the neighborhood of your island destroyed my ship. During the hurricane I perceived your anxiety on the shore to assist the sufferers. Your compassion pleased me, and I resolved to make your acquaintance. Your reception gained my heart; hence my protracted sojourn on your island.

"But the foreknowledge of your impending misfortune made me sad and gloomy, and therefore I left you. Had this change of fortune not been written in the book of destiny, I would have done all in my power to protect you.

"I went to England, but I was too late. The beautiful Elfrida had already pledged her heart, and I was unwilling to disturb her first and sacred love. On my return I visited the court of King Cruco, your conqueror. There I saw the Princess Obizza, his daughter, a lovely maiden, but with a heart so cold as to admit no love. I suppressed a growing passion, which might have endangered the peace of two kingdoms, and left."

Udo was at a loss how it came that Fortune, bestowing a crown upon his friend, refused him the moderate joy of domestic love, which she liberally bestowed upon the common shepherd and teamster. It seemed not his fault if yet he was a bachelor, and therefore Udo confessed to him, that he wished the solution of what to him seemed a riddle.

"You know," said Waidemuth, "that I have the gift of looking into the future. Other men drew blindfolded their lot—it may be a prize or a blank. But I consult with Fate, and when I find that the balance is not in my favor, I renounce a love whose sweet is embittered by the wormwood of repentance. The brightest expectations are the most deceitful. Could lovers draw the horoscope of their future destiny, but few brides would enter the nuptial couch, and the host of bachelors would darken the sun."

Udo concluded this conversation with some very good advice.

"It is better," said he, "in the choice of the heart to close one eye, and not with an eagle's eye to unveil the future, or rather the bride's. Should all competitors in marriage follow this rule, there were no danger for the sun being darkened by a host of bachelors."

The King of the Amber Coast took his good advice, and sought near by what he could not find far off: he divided heart and throne with a native maiden, drew at hap-hazard a good lot, and the constant joy of his conjugal felicity had no after-taste of wormwood.

King Waidmuth did all could to assuage the grief of his guest, but in vain. Udo remained thoughtful and sad; the image of his Edda was constantly before his eyes, and he often and often asked the Royal Seer to declase him her fate.

For some time Waidemuth avoided a definite answer, but at last he wisely concluded that the suspense between hope and fear is more cruel than certainty. He had nothing good to tell, and therefore he began with an introductory truism:

"A wounded nerve," said he, "causes sharper pain than when cut asunder, and a bruised member is worse than if separated from the sick body. Know, my brother, that your wife has been unable to survive the grief of your separation. Her spirit appeared to me before you came to this country; in Valhalla you'll find her again. Out of your cup she drank the farewell of love, wherein she mixed poison, when told that the city was in the power of the enemy; for she disdained to bear the chains of slavery and to be at the mercy of a cruel conqueror."

Udo lamented his noble wife during seven days, in the seclusion of his own apartments. But on the eighth day he came forward, serene and joyful, like the sun after a mist which dwindles away in the valley. All grief was banished from his heart, and his spirit looked out into the wide world, to try if the fickle goddess, after his sore trials, would deign to confer upon him some of her wonted favors.

Waidemuth communicated a plan to his bosom friend, who approved of it. "I cannot offer you a fortune," said he, "equal to your dignity. Born an independent sovereign, it behooves you to live as such, and, if possible, to be reinstated in your principality. The stars are not unfavorable; fortune awaits you at the very source of your misfortune."

Udo prepared for his departure. The king left nothing undone to equip him in the most stately manner. When the day approached, he gave a magnificent feast, to which all the magnates of his kingdom were invited, and which lasted nine days without interruption. On the last day he conducted his guest to an inner room, to drink with him the cup of friendship, and when the wine had warmed head and heart, and jovial sincerity had loosened the tongue, the host took his guest by the hand and spoke:

"One word more, my brother, before we separate. Receive this ring as the most unmistakable proof of friendship, not as a gift, but as a deposit for your benefit, as long as you may need it. At the same time learn a secret whereby you may know that my heart has opened itself to you: The whole world thinks I am a great magician. I know as little about magic as a new-born child. But you know that it is the fate of princes to get credit for qualities which they do not possess. Astrology I do understand; but all my magic is in this ring, the dying gift from a sage who was my friend. A small and lithe demon is enclosed in its crystal which assumes all forms according to the wish of the owner. He is without malice, quick, officious and faithful. It was he who, in the form of an empty barrel, carried me to your shore; he was in the stave which I took therefrom, and which I threw up for your pleasure, that in the form of a sparrow he should drive the partridges, and he returned to my hand, on which I carried him to the city. He amused your court with many tricks, and acquired me the name of an able juggler; he carried me from your island over sea to England in the form of a light canoe, and thence back to the shores of Mecklenburg. He was also my faithful agent who brought me tidings of your misfortune. At my behest, he, as a gentle zephyr, directed your little ship to the Amber Coast, and when the hurricane destroyed it he drew you from the deep to the shore, and carried you in your sleep to this palace. Not for half my kingdom would I part with my faithful Demon; but since I love you as my brother, I will lend him to you for a time, to use his services, and when you don't need him any more send him back to me with the ring in his beak. Whenever you want the spirit to serve you, turn the ring three times, to the right; he is immediately free and ready to fulfil your commands. But if you turn the ring three times to the left, he re-enters his crystal dwelling."

Prince Udo accepted the pledge of friendship with earnest gratitude, looked at the ring and perceived in the transparent crystal a misty little cloud, which imagination might transform into any little imp.

Following the advice of his prophetical Jonathan, Udo directed his course straight to Mecklenburg. He resolved to keep the strictest incognito, and however incredible it seemed to him that he should ever make his fortune in the residence of his conqueror, he abstained from troubling himself about it, and left the solution of the problem to time.

The city of Mecklenburg was the capital of the Kingdom of the Obotrites, the residence of their King. It was the European Bagdad or Cairo, the German London and Paris. Cruco had raised it to the summit of grandeur and prosperity. There he held his court, there he carried the vanquished princes and vessels. By the right of the strongest he had extended his empire and united all the tribes of the Obotrites under his sceptre.

Yet his felicity was not complete. He had no son to inherit his throne, and his only daughter Obizza could not succeed, for the Salic law prevailed at that time among all northern nations. But the King, in order to keep the succession in his family, had made a pragmatic sanction whereby the first-born son of his daughter should ascend the throne.

The princess was beautiful, but had a decided aversion to the other sex, and refused the most brilliant alliances. The king, who loved her tenderly, wished not to force her inclinations, unlike in this to most kings, who make the marriage of their daughters a political concern. He left her therefore the freest choice; but all was in vain. Mother nature had given her all the gifts she had to bestow, only not a loving heart.

Cruco her father lost all patience. An heir he would have, and therefore he gave all and every adventurer and freebooter full liberty to try his fortune, and make an impression upon the heart of the beautiful Obizza; not only this, but he promised the victorious suitor for the principality of Rugen as a reward.

Many were the knights who came from all quarters of the world to Mecklenburg to give assault to the heart of Obizza. They all were hospitably received: the princess was not allowed to refuse the approach to any. And it was curious to see the various methods to which they resorted in order to obtain access to her stubborn heart. Some tried it slyly, and in a stealthy manner, seeking favor by constant flattery. Others went head over heels and tried to obtain the prize at the first onset. All this confirmed the princess in her contempt of men, and at last not even Endymion could have made any impression upon her.

During this turmoil it was that Udo arrived at Mecklenburg. Not knowing under what name to be introduced at court, he joined the band of suitors. It struck him as very remarkable that his principality had just been promised as a prize; but he never thought of getting back his property through these means. Meanwhile he saw the princess, and, against his expectation, her appearance impressed him with such ravishment, as to disturb him in his sleep, and to have her constantly present in his dreams. He soon perceived that the same power which lifted him from the deep near the Amber Coast, drew him towards the princess. But she seemed not to notice him in the crowd of her surrounding suitors.

Until now he had not known what use to make of Waidemuth's gift: he thought of a plan to give the officious Demon some occupation. He transformed him into the nicest Cupid that ever inspired a song of love, and shut him up in a golden needle-case, with most precise orders to perform in his favor all the offices of the god of Love with the person who should open the case.

Once upon a fine summer-evening the court was in the royal gardens. A light breeze suddenly disturbed the veil of the princess. She asked a needle to readjust it. Prince Udo stepped forward, and, sinking on one knee, offered the golden case, containing a more dangerous present than those in the celebrated box of Pandora. The princess opened it without suspicion, and Demon slipped into her bosom, and wounded her with a golden arrow. Udo left immediately, full of anxiety as to the result of his undertaking.

The following day he perceived with rapture that the beautiful eyes of the proud Obizza sought him out in the crowd of her courtiers. On the third day Aya, the intelligent lady of honor, perceived that there was a little fluttering in favor of the strange cavalier. On the fourth day the court began to speak of the extraordinary phenomenon. The king himself got information, was very glad, and congratulated his own wisdom with the success of his measures. He delayed not a moment, until he took the shrinking Obizza in secret to inquire about her heart's affairs; and she was so little mistress of herself, that she covered her face with the veil, and under its protection freely confessed that the unknown knight had gained her heart.

To the amazement of the whole court, Udo received the princess from the hand of the king as a man without a name. The contracts were already arranged when the joyful father asked him what were his condition and ancestry. He told them without reserve. Cruco was rejoiced to have it in his power to restore the Prince of Rugen his loss with ten-fold interest. Udo remained at the Court until the heir to the throne was born—a magnificent boy, whom Father Cruco received with nameless joy from the hands of his daughter; and now he allowed his son-in-law to take possession of his property. As Udo needed no more the services of Demon, he sent him in the form of a sparrow, as was agreed, with the ring in his beak, to the princely owner with all his thanks.

Demon Amor has since formed many marriages, but none succeeded as well as that of Prince Udo with the sweet Obizza of Mecklenburg. For when he sues and joins, the tender couple in after times are apt to confess, in the heat of a domestic quarrel: "The devil has brought us together!"

LIFE-SIZED, FULL-LENGTH PHOTOGRAPHS are now being taken in this city by H. Bush, at his Photographic rooms, corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, with remarkable fidelity and clearness, by the aid of a new process and a mammoth solar instrument of his own invention; which he has brought to perfection, after seven years of experimenting and study. The Photograph he has on exhibition at his room is five feet by three, and is a worthy triumph of his art after many years of labor. It is not to be expected that Mr. Bush should explain to us the secrets of his invention as he has not yet received his patent from the Government, which has been applied for both for process and instrument. This instrument is set demurely on one side of the room, and looks more like a small sized cottage in mourning—being painted black—than a Photographic apparatus. With its aid Mr. Bush can produce twenty pictures an hour, (from small negatives) in any size required from two to five feet in height. He also claims that the pictures taken by his new process will hold their color and outline longer than those taken by the old style. These pictures are worthy of the examination of the public as curiosities of the art Photographic.

WULF [one of the Gothic invaders of Spain] died as he had lived, a heathen. Placedia, who loved him well, as she loved all righteous and noble souls, had succeeded once in persuading him to accept baptism. Adolf, the king, himself acted as one of his sponsors; and the old warrior was in the act of stepping into the font, when he turned suddenly to the Bishop and asked where were the souls of his heathen ancestors. "In hell," replied the worthy prelate. Wulf drew back from the font and threw his bear-skin cloak around him. He would prefer, if Adolf had no objection, to go to his own people.—Kingsley.

FOOLISH and imperfect as the religion of a Hindoo is, it is at least some restraint upon the intemperance of human passions. It is better a Brahmin should be respected than that nobody should be respected. A Hindoo had better believe that a deity with a hundred legs and arms will reward and punish him hereafter, than that he is not to be punished at all.—Sydney Smith.

THE BRILLIANT KEEPER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "EAST LYNNE."

IT was a comfortable room, even for the West-end of London. It was not the drawing-room of the house; it was not the commodious dining-room, where Sir Philip's patients waited their turn to go in to him; it was only a small cozy apartment, with a bright fire, easy chairs, and, generally, plenty of litter. For a wonder, it was tidy now; nothing was on the centre table, save Lady Annesley's desk, at which she sat writing—a plain, pleasant woman of forty, wearing weeds yet. The late Sir Robert, a popular and successful physician, had risen in the world and got his baronetcy; but this had been his second wife.

On a low sofa, near the fire, sat an old lady—a cheerful, nice old lady, in spite of her blindness and her eighty-four years. She would tell you, could you speak with her, that God had seen fit to take her dear son, Sir Robert, and had spared her. Upon her lap was a bag made of white linen, resembling a pillow-case, but not so long; and she was stuffing it with handfuls of paper torn into minute bits. Since she became blind she was wont to employ some of her time in tearing up waste paper, newspapers, and the like, to stuff cushions. Maria Carr, Lady Annesley's niece, was at the far window making the case for this cushion: two square pieces of white velvet on each of which was painted an exquisite group of flowers, Maria's doing. The cushion was intended for a present for Mary Annesley, who was on the point of marriage with Dr. Scott. She had gone out now with the late Sir Robert Annesley's ward, Georgina Livingston, who lived with them.

Mrs. Annesley looked up from her cushion and her bits of paper—if it be allowable to say that of one who has no sight; but when she spoke to people, she was in the habit of turning her face in the direction she thought they might be, as she had done before the darkness came on: "What about Charley's going to church? Is it decided?"

"Well; I suppose—" Lady Annesley stopped. The door had hastily opened, and a gentleman entered—a tall, fine man. But for the sweet smile that frequently parted his lips and lighted up his dark blue eyes, his features might have been deemed plain. And yet, ladies were apt to say that Sir Philip Annesley, being unmarried, was too attractive for a medical man.

"Is that Philip?"

"Myself, and nobody else, grandmamma;" for Sir Philip sometimes, half in sport, addressed her by the old familiar title of his boyhood. "Who will lend me a finger?"

"A finger!" echoed Lady Annesley. "What for? Ask Maria."

Maria laid down her velvet, and came forward. Sir Philip opened a little square box, and, taking out a ring, passed it on to the third, or wedding-finger, of her left hand. She stood before him, perfectly quiet in motion and bearing, but blushing to the very roots of her hair. Two thin chains of gold crossed and re-crossed each other, enclosing a brilliant between each crossing—twelve brilliants in all, but of the first water—a jewel of rare beauty, remarkably light and elegant.

"Philip, what a beautiful ring!" uttered Lady Annesley.

"Yes; it took my fancy. Mary will like a keeper, and Scott, in his absent fashion, is sure not to think of one. Lucky, I say, if he remembers the wedding-ring. It is too large; is it not, Maria?"

"Much too large for a keeper. Mary would require another ring to keep this one on."

"I ought to have chosen the smaller one," said Sir Philip. "There is another, just like it, only less in size. I'll take this one back and change it."

"It must have cost a good deal?" said Lady Annesley.

"Pretty well. Forty-eight guineas."

Mrs. Annesley lifted her hands in dismay. "Oh, Philip! Forty-eight guineas for a ring! It seems next door to a sin. Your father, my dear, would have looked twice at a quarter of the money before giving it."

He crossed the room, and put the keeper into her hand, bending down to her and speaking gently. "Feel it, grandmother, it really is a beauty. I know the sum is large; but we do not give away Mary every day."

Mrs. Annesley passed her fingers over the ring, after the manner of the blind, and handed it back to him.

"Philip, when do you intend to buy a wedding keeper on your own account? Ever?"

That sweet smile of his rose to his lips, and perhaps the least tinge of color to his face. "A doctor has no time to think of such things."

"No time?" returned the old lady, taking the remark literally. "I think he has as much time for it as other people. Where there's a will there's a way. Philip, do you know that you are in your thirty-fifth year?"

"And do you know also what your patients say?" put in Lady Annesley. "They say——"

"I can guess: that will do!" interrupted Sir Philip, with a laugh. "If they don't like an unmarried man, they need not come to me. Let them go elsewhere."

"Not they," said Lady Annesley, significantly. "Philip, you really ought to marry. Delay it another ten years, and your children will be growing up when you are an old man. I wish you would: it would set my mind at rest."

"At rest from what?" asked Sir Philip, in a hasty and somewhat sharp tone.

"Oh, well, I am not going to explain," answered Lady Annesley. "At rest in more ways than one."

"Provided, I presume, that I married to please you," cried Sir Philip, who understood the bye-play.

"Of course not to please me, Philip—I am nobody. To please your sisters, and to please the world."

"Terrible if I married only to please myself, would it not be, Lady Annesley?" he laughed.

He had never called her "mother;" at one time had studiously called her "Lady Annesley." Four-and-twenty years of age when his father married this, his second wife, Philip, in his inmost heart, had rebelled at the union. They all had, at first; but they learnt to like her in time. The girls were married now, save Mary, who would be the last.

"It is no joking matter, Philip. What a nice rose that is in your button-hole!" continued Lady Annesley. "Where did you get it?"

"Out of Mrs. Leigh's conservatory," he replied, taking it from his coat, a magnificent white rose, beautiful as a camelia; "she seduced me into it just now, when I was at her house."

"Is her daughter better?"

"No, poor girl. And I fear——"

Sir Philip did not say what he feared. He was not one to speak, at home, of his patients. In the silence that supervened, a servant appeared.

"Lady Oliver, sir."

"Sir Philip nodded, stood a moment or two, as if in thought, then prepared to descend.

"Will you put this up for me?" he said, giving the diamond keeper to Lady Annesley as he passed her. "I will change it when I go out. There, Maria! a present for you."

He flung the white rose into Maria's lap. She did not touch it, only let it lie there, her cheeks again growing hot. Lady Annesley knitted her brow. But it cleared as her eyes fell on the ring.

"I never did see a greater beauty!" she enthusiastically exclaimed, as she slipped it several times on and off her finger. "But what a judge Philip must have been to get it so large as this! Who is this coming up?"

It was Charles Carr, Maria's brother, popularly known in the house as "Charley." A young lieutenant he: gay, careless, and handsome. Often in scrapes, always in trouble; deep in debt, "in bills," in many things that he ought not to be; altogether, a gentleman who was believed to be going to the bad headlong especially by Lady Annesley. He was her own nephew, her dead brother's son; and he came to the house, presuming upon the relationship, and upon Maria's residence in it, oftener than Lady Annesley liked. A great fear was at her heart that he had grown too fond of Georgina Livingston, or that Georgina had of him—perhaps both. Her penniless nephew, who had not cross or coin to bless himself with, steal Georgina and her nine hundred a year! The world would talk then—would say that she, Lady Annesley, had planned it! And Lady Annesley was remarkably sensitive to the world's censure.

Charley glittered in, in full regimentals; one of the handsomest young fellows that had ever bowed before her Majesty at St. James's. And he had no objection that somebody else should see him and think so.

"Where's Georgina?" asked he.

"Georgina's out," snappishly replied Lady Annesley. "What are you dressed up for?"

"I have just come from the Levee. Did you forget it?" he returned, taking up mechanically the little jewel-box and opening it. Charley's fingers had a trick of touching things, and he often got a rap on the knuckles for it, literally and metaphorically, from my lady. "What a splendid ring!" he uttered.

"Sir Philip's present to Mary. But it is to be changed; it is too large."

Charley put it on his little finger and turned it round admiringly as they had all done. "A charming ring!" he repeated. "It is really beautiful."

"Do you not wish it were yours?" laughed Maria, from her distant window.

"I wish I had the cost of it," he said. "That would be of more use to me. What was it? Fifty guineas?"

"Not a bad guess," said Lady Annesley, who really liked Charley, and his good looks, and his good nature, au fond, when she could forget the fear and trouble touching Miss Georgina.

They stood together, singing praises of the ring; now she had it on—now he. Lady Annesley at length took it from him and held it over the open box, as if taking a farewell of it before she dropped it in.

"Oh dear!" cried out Mrs. Annesley.

Lady Annesley hastily put the lid on, left the box on the table by Charley, and ran to her mother-in-law. The old lady had let the sack fall upon the hearth-rug, and some of the ammunition was falling out.

"Don't trouble yourself, my dear," she said, as Lady Annesley began pushing it in. "Put it on my lap again; I won't be so clumsy a second time. It is nearly full, you see."

Lady Annesley did as requested, and returned to the table. Charley, restless Charley, was then standing by Maria, and the two were whispering together. Lady Annesley took a sheet of fair white paper and wrapped up the little box, without again looking in it, lighted a wax match, and sealed it.

"Well I must be off," cried Charles. "Shall you be at home this evening?"

"I shall," laughed grandmamma, from her place on the sofa. "I don't suppose many of the others will be out." She had not penetrated to Lady Annesley's fear; and Charley was a wonderful favorite of hers.

"Look, Maria," said Lady Annesley, as they heard Charley and his sword clattering down the stairs four at a time "I will put it here. If Philip should come for it, you can tell him where it is."

She lifted the lid of her desk and put in the little box. Then approached Mrs. Annesley and took hold of her arm to lead her from the room. "We shall have no drive to-day, unless we make haste. Maria will finish that."

"It's finished, all but tacking," said the old lady; "it is as full as it ought to be. Maria, my dear, come and do it at once."

Maria carried her velvet to the sofa, and set about completing the cushion, kneeling down for convenience sake. She had got the velvet cover on to it, and was beginning to put round the gold cord and to sew on the tassels, when Sir Philip entered. He rested his arms on the back of the sofa, and looked down at her and her work—a fair girl she, with a gentle face.

"I wonder if folks would send me presents if I set up housekeeping on my own score?" cried he.

"You had better try them," said Maria. But she spoke the words without thought, and felt, the moment they had left her lips, that she had rather have bitten out her tongue than uttered them.

"But the flitting from the house for all of you, what a trouble it would be!" returned he, in a tone of much remonstrance. "I don't know that every one of you would have to go, though," he continued, while the too conscious crimson dyed her face, and she played nervously with the gold cord.

"Certainly not, if Lady Annesley had her way," he resumed. Maria, astonished at the words, glanced at him in amazement. "Don't you see it all, Maria?"

"See what?" she exclaimed.

"Nay, I shall not tell you. So much the better if you have not seen it. I thought it had been patent to the house. My vanity may be in error, after all."

"What do you mean, Sir Philip?"

He was gazing hard at her with his deep blue eyes—vain and saucy enough they were, just then. She felt completely at sea.

"Give me your opinion, Maria? If I did resolve to set up housekeeping for myself, do you think that any one of you could be induced to stop and help me in it?"

Her heart beat violently—her eyes fell. The gold cord in her fingers was wreathing itself into knots. Sir Philip came round and laid his hand upon her shoulder as she knelt, making her turn her face to him.

"Because I may be asking the question some day. Do you know where Lady Annesley put the ring?"

She sprang up. She opened the desk, and gave the parcel to him, sealed as Lady Annesley had left it. He slipped it into his waistcoat pocket, went down to his brougham, and drove off.

In less than twenty minutes he was back again, and came flying up the stairs as fast as Charley Carr had flown down them.

"A pretty simpleton you made of me, Maria!—giving me an empty box!"

"An empty box!" she echoed.

He took the box out of his pocket, and held it open before her.

"I told the man I had brought back the ring to exchange for the smaller one; opened the box, all gingerly, to hand it to him, and behold! there was nothing in it."

"Did you drop it in the brougham? Did you open it in the brougham?" she reiterated.

"I never touched it after you saw me put it in my pocket, until I was in the shop. I unsealed the paper before the shopman's eyes."

"Then where can it be?" exclaimed Maria. "Lady Annesley certainly sealed it up, and put it, herself, in the desk, ready for you. No one went near the desk afterwards—no one came into the room, or was in the room, but myself."

"Lady Annesley must have sealed up an empty box, that's clear," said Sir Philip. "I have brought the other ring."

But Lady Annesley, when she entered, protested that she had not sealed up an empty box—that the ring was in it. And she related the details to Sir Philip, as they have been given above. The box, she said, was not out of her hand a minute altogether.

"Are you sure you put it in?—that you did not let it slip aside?" questioned Sir Philip.

"Sure!" repeated Lady Annesley, half inclined to resent the implied suggestion of carelessness; "I am quite sure. And, had the ring slipped aside, it would only have gone on to the table. I put it in safely, and shut it in."

"Who was in the room, beside yourselves?" asked Sir Philip.

"Only Charley Carr. He was standing by me, wishing that the ring were his."

"No." cried out Mrs. Annesley, innocently; "wishing its value in money was his! The more sensible wish of the two."

A wild, sickening sensation darted to Maria Carr's brain. It was not yet a suspicion; it was a fear lest suspicion should come: nay, a foreboding that it was coming.

The suspicion did come: came immediately, to all of them. In vain Sir Philip suggested that Charles must have done it in a joke, to put Lady Annesley in a fright, for he was as full of tricks as a monkey—that he would bring it back with him in the evening. That he had taken the ring from the box there was no doubt whatever; and Lady Annesley, in her anger, refused to be soothed.

She attacked Charles the moment he made his appearance. "Where's that keeper?" she sternly demanded, without circumlocution.

"What keeper?" returned Charles.

"The brilliant keeper, that you made off with to-day."

"I don't know what you mean, aunt."

Lady Annesley flew into a rage. "I left the box close to your hands when I turned to pick up the cushion for Mrs. Annesley. How dared you take the ring out?"

"Let's see whether I have got it about me," retorted Charley, in a careless, indifferent, provoking manner, as he made a show of feeling in all his pockets. "Oh—I must have left it in my regimentals"

Lady Annesley nearly boiled over. Words led to words; Charles grew angry in his turn; and at length she gave a hint that he must have stolen the ring. He declared he had not touched the box, or the ring: that he had turned from the table when Lady Annesley did, and remained talking to Maria while the cushion was being picked up; and he swore to this with sundry unorthodox words, forgetting that he was not in quarters, but in a lady's drawing-room.

"If nobody takes his part, I will!" hotly cried Georgina Livingston, after Charles had dashed away from the house, promising that he'd never enter it again; and her countenance was distressed, and her cheeks were scarlet, as she said it. "Steal a ring! You may just as well accuse me, Lady Annesley, as accuse him; I should be the more likely of the two to do it."

"Do, pray, recollect yourself, Georgina!" remonstrated my lady. "Is this avowal seemly for a young girl?"

"I don't care whether it's seemly or unseemly," responded Miss Georgina, dashing away some tears. "You ought to be ashamed of yourselves, all of you! Because Charley happens not to be made of money, you turn against him, and think he'd take it. I'll let him know that I don't."

Hot words, hotly spoken. A few days, and even Georgina was obliged to judge him less leniently. Sir Philip chose quietly to investigate the suspicion; and he ascertained that Charles had, the very evening subsequent to the loss of the ring, and the following day, paid sundry small debts, for which he had been long dunned. Twenty pounds, at least, of these payments were traced, and then Sir Philip dropped the search. Why pursue it? It was all too clear, for Charles had no resources of his own to draw upon.

But here Maria stepped in to his defence. She protested with earnestness, with tears, that she had furnished him herself with twenty pounds; that she had given it to him in that moment when they were whispering together. She knew Charles's wants, she said, and had been saving this money up for him. Lady Annesley flatly contradicted Maria. It did not stand to reason, she contended, that Maria, with her poor means, could save up twenty pounds, or even ten. The thing was almost against possibility; and Maria fell under nearly as great a ban as her brother, for attempting to screen him by falsehood. There were moments when, in her own sick heart, Maria did not believe him to be guilty. Such things have been heard of in the world—done in the recklessness of necessity.

* * * * *

A twelvemonth passed away—and a twelvemonth brings changes. Georgina Livingston was of age now, and at liberty to choose her own residence. She was alone in the drawing-room one April evening. Mrs. Annesley was much confined to her chamber, and Lady Annesley had gone up to her. Sir Philip came in.

"Alone, Georgina! Why! what is the matter?—crying?"

"Oh, Lady Annesley set me on!" was the young lady's pettish rejoinder, as she brushed the tears away. "She was angry with me for 'moping,' as she called it; and I told her I would not stay here to be grumbled at."

"Why do you mope?" he asked.

"Because I chose," was the wilful retort. "I can leave now if I like you know, Philip."

"If you like—yes," assented Sir Philip. "Where should you go?"

"I don't know, and I don't much care," dreamily responded Georgina.

"Would you like to remain in the house for good?" resumed Sir Philip, after a pause. "I was thinking of asking you to do so."

A faint blush rose to her face, but she showed no other emotion: and his tone, considering the momentous words, was wonderfully calm. Perhaps both had been conscious for some little time that these words would be spoken. Sir Philip bent his head towards her.

"The world has reproached me with not marrying. Help me, Georgina, to put the reproach away! There is no one I would ask to be my wife but you."

"Look here, Philip!" she exclaimed, pushing back her hair, and turning her face, full of its own eager excitement, towards him—excitement not caused by him. "I'll speak out the truth to you; I could not to every one: but you are good, and true, and noble. Were I to say to you 'Yes,' and let you take me, believing that I loved you, I should just be acting a lie. I loved some one else; I am trying to forget him with my whole heart and might—but I did love him."

"Who was this?"

"Charles Carr."

Sir Philip's blue eyes flashed with a peculiar light, and he looked into the fire—not at Georgina.

"That love ought to end," he said. "It can bring you no good."

"Don't I tell you that it has ended—that I am putting it from me as fast as ever I can! But the remembrance cannot go all at once. I did love him; and I believe it was your generosity, in hushing up his dreadful disgrace, instead of proclaiming it and prosecuting him, that first made me like you more than common."

"You acknowledge, then, that you do like me?" smiled Sir Philip.

"Very—very much."

"Well enough to take me for better and for worse?"

"Yes; if, after this confession, you would still wish it."

"I do," he answered, drawing her to him, and taking his first kiss from her lips. Georgina flew to her room, and there burst into a flood of tears.

Lady Annesley was strangely elated at the news. She had hoped for it in her inmost heart—long and long.

"You have done well, Philip," she said to her step-son.

"I shall escape the worrying about not getting married, at any rate," responded Sir Philip.

"Philip"—lowering her voice confidentially—"do you know, I frightened myself to death, at one time, lest you should marry Maria. I fancied you were growing attached to her; and people would have said I had set it on."

The red color flashed into Sir Philip's face. "I should have married her but for that affair of the diamond-keeper."

Lady Annesley looked blank. "Did you like her so much as that?"

"Like her!" he echoed in emotion, "I loved her. I am not sure but I love her still. Why, Lady Annesley, I all but asked her to be my wife the very afternoon that wretched boy did the mischief."

"I'm sure I'm very glad he did do it, if it prevented that," retorted my lady.

"I might have got over that; his fault; but I could not get over Maria's. To uphold him in his deceit—to invent a falsehood to screen him—how could I make her my wife?"

"Whatever is there about Maria to like?" fretfully interrupted Lady Annesley.

"She's more likeable than any one in this world, to my thinking——"

"Hush, Philip!"

The news of the engagement went forth to the house. Maria had still remained in it, making herself useful, as she had done before, especially to Mrs. Annesley, for she had no other home. Better she had quitted it: to see Sir Philip daily was not the way to cure her love for him.

"I hope you will be happy, Sir Philip; I wish you every happiness," she stammered, believing it was incumbent on her to say something to that effect. But Sir Philip observed that her face turned ghastly with emotion as she spoke.

"Thank you; I hope we shall be," he coldly replied; and, since that unhappy episode, he had never spoken to her but coldly. "Georgina Livingston possesses one great essential towards making herself and others happy—truth."

The preparations for the wedding went briskly on. Lady Annesley would first move into another residence. No change had been made since Sir Robert's death, but Sir Philip must have his house to himself now. One evening Sir Philip was spending an hour with Dr. Scott. A navy surgeon was also there—Mr. Blake, once their chum at Bartholomew's: and Georgina was sitting upstairs with Mary Scott and her baby.

"Is smoking allowed here?" asked the surgeon—glancing at the elegant sofa on which he sat, where was displayed that beautiful cushion painted by Maria Carr—"I'm half dead without my pipe."

Receiving assent, he lighted it, and then walked across the room to Sir Philip and the Doctor, who stood at the window. There was some disturbance in the street, and they all three remained there chatting and looking out.

Suddenly a burst of light shot up in the twilight of the room, and they wheeled round in consternation. A blaze was ascending from the velvet cushion. They caught up the hearth-rug and succeeded in putting out the fire. Georgina Livingston, hearing the commotion, came in with a white face.

In lighting his pipe Mr. Blake must have suffered a spark to fall upon the cushion. There it had smouldered, penetrating at length to the stuffing, which then blazed up. You may remember that it consisted of paper.

"Oh, that lovely cushion!" lamented Georgina.

"What's this?" uttered Dr. Scott, picking up something bright and glistening from the ashes. "If I don't believe it's a ring!"

A ring it was. The lost, the beautiful, the brilliant keeper! The eyes of Sir Philip and Georgina met.

Maria was that same evening sitting alone; she and her breaking heart. It had felt breaking ever since that cloud fell upon it. She heard Sir Philip come home—and she began gathering her work together.

"Don't run away, Maria; I have something to tell you!"

She looked at him in wonderment. His voice wore the same loving tone as in days gone by; a tone long past, for her.

"Lend me your hand, Maria!" And, without waiting for assent, he took it in his, the left hand, and slipped upon the third finger, as he had done once before, the diamond-keeper. "Do you recognize it?"

"It is Mrs. Scott's," replied Maria. "Why have you brought it here, Sir Philip?"

"It is not Mrs. Scott's: it is larger than her's. Do not remove it, Maria. It shall be your own keeper, if you will let me add the wedding-ring."

Confused, bewildered, wondering what it meant, wondering at the strangely loving expression that gleamed on her from his dark blue eyes, she burst into tears. Was he saying this to mock her?

No: not to mock her. No! Sir Philip wound his arms round her neck as he told the tale; he drew her face to his breast, his eyelashes glistening in the intensity of his emotion. "I can never let you go again, my darling! I do not ask your forgiveness; I know that you will give it me unasked, for you and I have been alike miserable."

"Charley innocent!—been innocent all this while?" she gasped.

"He has, in good truth! We must try and make it up to him. I——"

"Oh, Philip!" she interrupted, with streaming eyes; "you will believe me now! I did give him the twenty pounds—I did, indeed! I had saved it in so many trifles; I had made old gowns look like new ones; all for him. You should not have doubted me, if the rest did."

"My whole life shall atone to you, Maria," he softly whispered. "Georgina——"

She broke from him, her cheeks flushing crimson. In the moment's bewilderment she had totally forgotten his engagement to Georgina. He laughed merrily, his eyes dancing, and drew her back again.

"Never fear that I am about to turn Mormon, and marry you both! Georgina has given me completely up, Maria. In the excitement caused by the discovery, she spoke her mind out to me, that she did not like me, with all her 'trying,' half as well as she did Charley Carr, and that none but Charley should be her husband. Scott has gone to tell Charles the news, and bring him up. If——"

"What on earth is this?" ejaculated Lady Annesley, as she came in and stood like one petrified.

"It's this," replied Sir Philip, holding out Maria's hand, on which shone the brilliant keeper. "This mischief-making ring has turned up again. When you held it that day over the open box, and Mrs. Annesley called out, there can be no doubt that you in the hurry, unconsciously slipped it on your finger, instead of into the box, and lost it off your finger again immediately amidst the paper stuffing. The cushion has just given up its prey."

Lady Annesley sank upon the first seat, with a very crestfallen expression. "I never heard of such a thing!" she stammered. "My finger! What ever will be the consequence? Poor Charley!

"The consequence, I expect, will be that you will have two weddings instead of one," laughed Sir Philip. "Georgina has proclaimed her intentions, and I don't suppose Charley will bear malice. I think I ought to have given the ring as a memento, instead of to Maria."

"To Maria!" irascibly returned Lady Annesley, not precisely understanding, but not feeling comfortable. "What in the world need is there to give it to her, Sir Philip?"

"Great need," he replied, his tone becoming serious. "But it is given with a condition attached to it—that I add one of plain gold. Ah! Lady Annesley, we cannot be false to ourselves, try as we will. Maria has remained my best and dearest love up to this hour, cajole and deceive my heart as I would. And now, I trust, she will remain so, so long as time shall last!"

ANECDOTE OF CHARLES KEAN.—Blackwood for September gives the following anecdote of the famous English actor now performing in this city: "I remembered an anecdote of a fellow-sufferer, and my memory helped me to some consolation. It was during one of Charles Kean's visits to the United States. He was entertained at dinner by one of the great New York merchants. Opposite to him at the table there sat a gentleman, who continued to observe him with marked attention, and at last called on the host to present him to Mr. Kean. The introduction was duly made, and ratified by drinking wine together, when the stranger, with much impressiveness of manner, said, "I saw you in Richard last night." Kean, feeling, not unnaturally, that a compliment was approaching, smiled blandly and bowed. "Yes, sir," continued the other, in a slow, almost judicial tone: "I have seen your father in Richard: and I saw the last Mr. Cook—" another pause, in which Charles Kean's triumph was gradually mounting higher and higher. "Yes, sir, Cook, sir, was better than your father; and your father, sir, a long way better than you!"

MISCELLANY.

To feel that life is ended—to wish that existence, too, had ceased; and so to sit down, an aching hollow, and take a part and sham an interest in twaddle—to please others. Such are women's feats. How like nothing at all they look! A man would rather sit on the buffer of a steam-engine and ride at the great Redan.—Reade.

THERE is no such thing as forgetting possible to the mind; a thousand accidents may and will interpose a veil between our present consciousness and the secret inscriptions on the mind; accident of the same sort may also rend away this veil; but alike, whether veiled or unveiled, the inscription remains forever; just as the stars seem to withdraw before the common light of day, whereas, in fact we all know that it is the light which is drawn over them as a veil, and that they are waiting to be revealed when the obscuring daylight shall have withdrawn.—"Confessions of an Opium Eater"—De Quincy.

CROSSING THE EQUATOR.—Count de Chasseloup-Laubat, Minister of Marine, has addressed a letter to the maritime prefects severely censuring a scandalous scene which recently took place on board a transport vessel belonging to the French navy, on the occasion of a ceremony of crossing the line; not only were the priest passengers in their canonical apparel forced to take part in the burlesque ceremonial, but the whole proceedings were a parody on religion itself. The honorable Minister instructs the prefects to call on captains of vessels to prohibit in the ceremonies in question everything of a nature to outrage the respect due to religion and the sacred character of its ministers.

A RAILWAY INCIDENT.—The Duke of B—— was travelling by rail, recently, and the sole occupant of a first-class carriage, when, at an intervening station, another passenger got in in a hurry. No sooner did he perceive that there was but one passenger in the carriage than he called out pretty lustily, "Guard, guard, let me out!" The train, however, started immediately, and the stranger dropped into his seat, looking exceedingly nervous, and ventured at length to say, "It's rather an awkward thing travelling with only one man now-a-days." The duke, whose frank and open countenance might satisfy the most suspicious, appreciated the joke, but did not take the advantage of it he fairly might, and replied, good-naturedly, "Well, if you are not afraid of me I am not afraid of you."

PROTEST AGAINST HER STATUE.—In the Figaro there appears an amusing letter soi-disant from the "Spirite" of Mme. de Sevigne, remonstrating in most pathetic language against the statue which is proposed to be erected to her memory at Vichy. She complains of the unfair harshness of the decree which condemns her, merely because her letters to her daughter were agreeably written, either to stand upright in the middle of a public square, or, like Moliere, to sit eternally at a fountain at the corner of a street. She implores posterity to spare her being thus held up to ridicule, and suggests that the money voted for the purpose be distributed among distressed authors, or devoted to the erection of an institution for their support in old age or sickness.

PLEASURES OF LION-HUNTING.—The Journal des Chasseurs states that Si-Abdalah, a famous lion-hunter of Bona, Algeria, has just presented to the museum of that town the skin of a lioness, in killing which he nearly lost his life. Some time since Si-Abdalah, who enjoyed a great reputation among the Arabs for his skill and courage in hunting lions, of which he had already killed eleven, was informed that a lioness had committed dreadful ravages among the cattle of a neighboring tribe, and he accordingly went in pursuit of it, armed with a long single-barrelled flint gun. He soon found the animal, and wounded her, but as it was night he could not trace her through the woods. The next morning he went to look out, and having found her thicket, wounded her again, but not mortally, for she sprang on him and tore him dreadfully with her teeth and claws. She would certainly have killed him had not some Arabs who heard his cries hastened up and shot her dead. The sub-prefect of Bona immediately had Si-Abdalah conveyed to the military hospital, where he received every necessary attention, and has since completely recovered from his injuries.

AN AWKWARD MADONNA MIRACLE.—The ecclesiastical authorities of Madrid have been lately confounded by a miracle which, it is alleged, the Madonna has performed rather to the disadvantage of the Church. A soldier of that city, being found in possession of a golden cup which had lain for some time as a votive offering on one of the many altars of the Virgin, was cited before the police-court, and accused of its theft. This son of Mars was not, however, at a loss for a defence. He at once pleaded that, he and his family being in great distress, he had appealed to the Holy Mother for assistance, and that while he was engaged in prayer and contemplation of the four million-worth of jewels displayed on her brocaded petticoat, she stooped, and, with a charming smile, handed him the golden vessel. This explanation, it is said, was received in "profound silence" by the court, which, feeling that the matter was thus taken out of the domain of "the natural" and brought into that of "the supernatural," handed the case over to the Ecclesiastical Commission. This court, however, to the no small astonishment of the accused, decided that, though the admission was inconvenient, the possibility of the miracle could not be denied; and so the cup was handed back to the soldier with solemn injunctions to avoid seeking similar favors from images in the future, and to observe the profound silence which the Virgin required of him as a proof of his gratitude for her kindness. The conquering hero no doubt returned home delighted at the success of the ruse by which he had outwitted his judges, and proved that miracles may sometimes be performed for the benefit of an earthly militant as well as the "Church Militant."

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

 Correspondents will address all communications, business and otherwise, to "The Californian," office, No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco.*

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1864.

THE NEWS.

THE news has been so steadily cheering for the past ten days, and our armies have gathered such a sheaf of victories, that in our California fashion we have accepted the new condition of things as the rule, our quick enthusiasm has evaporated, and only a temporary disaster to the Federal arms will thoroughly awaken us, and set us to considering the merits of our previous successes. The Valley of the Shenandoah, which for nearly three years was the Valley of the Shndow of Death to our brave soldiers and their sacred cause, has lately been purged with Northern fire. Sheridan's bayonets have been successful everywhere. As the Union armies have advanced, they have also pierced the delusive mists which hitherto surrounded their foes. They have disclosed the fact that the rebels are demoralized and scattered, made up of dissatisfied conscripts, who were forced from their homes by military despots—of gray-haired men and smooth-faced striplings, "younger sons of younger brothers," and that the rebel leaders have "misused the King's press most damnably." Contact with these men discovered how they had been clinging together only through the instincts of pillage, and that disaster has scattered their undisciplined forces far and wide. Military men in Washington believe that Gen. Grant can take Richmond when he pleases, but only withholds that he may gain a victory less bloody; and as we look back across that red sea through which our war chariots have hitherto passed, his humane policy seems an earnest of success. Price, defeated, flies from the State he has so often attempted to redeem, but whose redemption he has never yet effected except in this somewhat inglorious manner. Abroad, an old enemy—the London Times—in view, perhaps, of the commercial depression in England, and of the low quotation of rebel bonds, thinks that we had better fight it out, and so become purified by war as Europe did to establish its present basis. The election returns from Pennsylvania, although imperfect and incomplete, do not seem inclined to abate the Union triumphs. Private telegrams say that the National prospects, political and military, never looked more encouragingly. McClellan's chances appear ghost-like and unsubstantial even in Missouri, Kentucky, New Jersey and Delaware. The argument which led many unthinking people to suppose that the soldiers would vote for a former officer whom they respected, it has been found will not apply to a volunteer army, made up of thoughtful civilians who have not yet sunk their citizenship in their new martial calling. Wherever we look the signs are cheering. The horizon is yet ruddy and streaked as with blood, but it is only the rosy flush that follows the long and terrible night of crime and shame through which the nation has just passed, and precedes the dawning of a brighter and more glorious day.

MYSTERIOUS.—The Call contains the following enigmatical notices:

☞ Notice.—A Committee Meeting of the "Blue Lambs" will be held on Sunday evening next, at the usual place, to make the necessary arrangements for a general assembly of the Society to determine votes for the contested election.

THOMAS PECKOVER, Chairman.

San Francisco, October 25, 1864.

☞ A Committee Meeting of the "Green Lions" is hereby summoned for Monday next, at the Club Rooms. Business—to take into consideration a proposition from the "Blue Lambs," and to fix date for general meeting previous to contested election. THOMAS TOPPER, Chairman.

What can be the "proposition" of the "Blue Lambs?" Do they propose to lie down with the "Green Lions," but wish first an assurance of their personal safety? Is the election the one mentioned by Æsop? Speak, Chairman Peckover! and thou, Topper, explain!

THE RACE TO-DAY.—The great race between Honest Ance and Unknown comes off at Bay View Park at 2 P. M. to-day. The well-known speed of the horses and the large sum at stake will ensure a large assemblage. The last race was attended by great numbers of the best people of the city and many ladies graced the scene with their presence. The balcony will be reserved for them on this occasion, and we expect to see "all the world" there this afternoon.

THE BALL OF THE SEASON.—The Fire Department of our city announces that their first Annual Ball will be given at Union Hall, on the 8th of December next. We understand that the greatest precaution and care will be taken that the arrangements in every respect shall all serve to render this, their first Ball, the most desirable festival of the season. The tickets are to be limited, not transferable, obtained only of the managers, and to be rated at $10, including supper.

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

WHEN Foucault, the young French savant, announced to the world his simple experiment whereby the daily motion of the earth on its axis was made apparent to the eye, great incredulity was expressed by men of high attainments in science, and the fact utterly denied by those of no attainments. To this day, many—though seeing the result and otherwise of clever intellect—cannot appreciate the steps by which it is reached, and this only from a defect in that peculiar kind of exact education that fits them to follow along the links of a scientific problem, from point to point, securing each as they proceed, and which mode leads to the conclusion as surely and clearly as that the night follows the day. Without this no satisfactory progress can be made; no amount of mental power, however strong in other matters, will avail aught here, for it yields not its treasures to the sturdiest blows at random struck, and turns upon its surface the sharp edge of the brightest thought. What effect has the keenest scimitar or most ponderous battle-axe, if misdirected and made to fall by the unskilful hand upon the wrong point of the foe's helmet?

To the inexact mind it is a mystery that it cannot comprehend after the simplest demonstration—forever lost in the mazes of a system, to it labyrinthic in its construction. No mystery here. You violate the law of cause and effect, no proper means or way being taken no effect comes to your mind, that's all.

Once in conversation with a gentleman of the highest literary ability and political position, and who had but recently, then, retired from the United States Senate, in the day of that Senate's effulgence, to take charge of the department of Belles-Lettres and Political Economy in one of the first Universities of the country. he mentioned to our surprise the great difficulty he had to understand the simplest mathematical problem throughout its entire course—even when disrobed somewhat of its severe technical character and terms. His education had rambled, as he well expressed it, along a picturesque path of poetry and oratory, skipping here and there among the pleasures and excitements of the place, till he had lost the habit of exact rigid reasoning, such as science gives and requires. He had lost the links as he went along in life, and it was too late, it was impossible now to pick them up.

And yet, who was this that so confessed his inability? The peer and cotemporary of Webster, Calhoun and Clay, the rival of Patrick Henry and Prentiss in the splendor and power of his oratory, the fertility and brilliancy of his imagination, and, in finished, polished style, perhaps unequalled by any in this country—a man to sway masses and make his will other men's will, a child when brought face to face with the rigor of precise, exact thought.

Encouraged by the tone of his voice and familiar address to one so far inferior in years and position, we were emboldened to ask his attention to the beautiful Foucault experiment, then uppermost in our thoughts, and offered by description and diagram an explanation of its simple secrets. The offer was accepted by him in terms of delicate pleasing compliment. Without further ado, we asked him to imagine a pendulum set in motion, over a given spot and in a certain direction, in a close chamber, free from all disturbing influences of every kind whatever, whether from the atmosphere or otherwise. Let this pendulum, so placed in motion, have a sufficient impulse to sustain its oscillation for some length of time without the application of new and additional force; in such case, the direction in which it moves, or more properly, the plane which it cuts will always remain the same. Granted, and we proceed. Now, suppose this pendulum has a rod of great length, 200 feet or more—and it was with such a length that the experiment was made by the writer—that an oscillation of considerable arc, 30 or 40 feet, is given to it, and that such a pendulum is swung directly over one of the poles of the earth coincident with its axis, protected from all disturbances, as we say, and that a due north and south course is given to its vibration. Place a circular piece of card beneath it, with degrees and subdivisions of degrees marked on it, and in a very short time the motion, now north and south, will appear to vary its course or line of travel, the pendulum even cutting new degrees, till in the lapse of six hours, it will be found vibrating east and west, and in twenty-four hours, (the time of the earth's revolution on its axis,) if the motion be continued so long, the line of motion will have passed entirely round the card to its original course of north and south. But the line of vibration, as we have shown, remains fixed, never varies; hence the change of motion must and can only be due to the motion of the earth and the card which is attached to and part of it.

The card it is that moves with the moving earth, and brings new points and degrees under the line of oscillation, which, unvarying in itself, is thus apparently made to constantly change its direction. This, of course, is an illusion of the same kind that we daily witness in the apparent motion of the sun through the heaveus, when in fact the sun is fixed and the earth it is that moves—which discovery brought such trouble to its great author, and in the dark ages was denounced as the work of the devil and a crime against heaven. Not so, however, in this case, for the dome of the cathedral of Notre Dame itself, affording a fine height, was placed by Napoleon at the service of M. Foucault for his demonstration of the fact.

This experiment, an instance of perfect illusion to the eye—to the mind conclusive evidence of such motion in the earth—is, however, still stranger when we express it in another way; that we are unconscious of the motion of a body of which we are a part, and yet this motion, still unconscious of it, made palpable to us by experiment, so to speak, outside of ourselves.

All this was readily seen and admitted by the listener, for we had not yet reached the place where the chain was broken—the link of sequence wanting to his mind. We advance one step further: At the pole, as we have seen, every degree of the circle will be cut in succession in twenty-four hours; but how at the equator and points on the earth's surface between the pole and equator, is the same true there? By no means. A smile of triumph not unmingled with affection crossed his playful, versatile features—and the question instantly came: A mathematical rule not the same everywhere, eh? if this is so, how can it be true? Somewhat stirred by his manner more than by the question itself, rapidly and as clearly we explained that its time of passage round the entire circle varied between the pole and equator, varied inversely as the degree of latitude; that at the equator where there is no latitude the time of its passage became so great as to be beyond calculation, and, therefore, properly might be said to be infinite and to require an eternity for its accomplishment. With a shrug of the shoulder and an elevation of his dark, shaggy eye-brows, expressive of doubt, rather disbelief, he suddenly asked what we thought of Schlegel's history of Literature. The scientific talk was over; he had lost the necessary link in the progress of the problem, no longer of interest to him, because no longer intelligible, and sought the society of his congenial first-love, with its charms and graces, easy to the mind, seductive to the sentiment.

But worse, for when pressed to name the point of difficulty, the reply we got put an end to all further effort; for in honest, candid way he said, that however simple to us and others might be the statement and demonstration, that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles, he had always failed to appreciate it. This was enough. We forebore, and no more disturbed his sweet communion with the mistress of his heart and head. TRISMEGISTUS.

ANGELS' VISITS.—A lady called at THE CALIFORNIAN office last evening, with a gentleman protector, "just for fun," to see an editorial sanctum, and what it looked like. We cannot deny that it looked like the very—deuce: the dramatic reviewer being in the last stages of an exciting criticism on Birch, William, and had thrown ink and paper about in his throes, in a reckless manner. Bob, the devil, had upset the paste-pot; "Trismegistus" had been in, correcting proof, and had upset his tobacco and left his pipe lying around loose; and the sanctum weareth not that air of neatness and order that would better become it, but we put on our most sanctimonious expression and endeavored to look as if it was only an accidental state of affairs. Should the lady do us the honor to call again, a few moments' notice would raise us very much in her estimation of our character for order and neatness. Some Webbs may be very good-looking, but cob-webs are best when well brushed. Our apology must be that our broom has been spirited away by some lawless "ranger," and in the present state of politics it won't do to go out shopping for that article, as we might lose credit with our grocer.

THE STATE AGRICULTURAL FAIR.—A delegation of San Franciscans, in token of the hospitality extended to them during their visit to the Fair, thus acknowledge their thankfulness to the Sacramentans:

We, the undersigned, in gratitude for the exceeding liberality displayed by the President and Board of Managers of the California State Agricultural Society, and for the untiring courtesy shown all visitors, not only by them but by the citizens of Sacramento in general, take this method of returning our unbounded thanks. The past Fair of the State Agricultural Society has been a great success in the following particulars: the splendid contests made for the premiums, which have been the largest ever known; the fast time that has characterized the races, giving indubitable proof that California is rapidly outstripping all other States in the production of fine horses; and the general popular approbation that has greeted all awards of premiums. As long as the noble horse shall be considered the best friend of man, and the time-honored practice of racing exist and be the amusement of gentlemen who only ask fair field and no favor, so long will the Fair of 1864 and the genial and liberal gentlemen who made it a success, be held in remembrance by their sincere friends and well-wishers:

David D. Colton, K. F. Morrow, S. B. Whipple, Albert Whipple, H. Snearty, J. A. Batchelor, W. F. Williamson, J. R. Hardenberg, Wm. W. Gift, J. G. Israel, Asa Porter, E. W. Teackle, Wm. Hendrickson, Roe Allen, John Speed, D. P. McHarg, A. E. Head, A. C. Hamilton, N. W. Mumson, Ben. E. Harris, Wm. Watt, H. R. Covey, N. Coombs, W. T. Grissin.

CROWDED OUT.—"Incidents of the Mexican War," No. 2, is in type, but we are compelled to defer it till next week.

AFTER all that has been said of the vices of the Hindoos, we believe that a Hindoo is more mild and sober than most Europeans, and as honest and chaste.—Sydney Smith.

PHANTOMS.

Oftentimes in my dreams,
Beloved forms are near, dead hands clasp mine;
I wake, and still it seems
That over me their radiant faces shine.

As footprints on the sand
Are borne to ocean by the ebbing tide;
So, if I stir my hand,
Will these dear phantoms into darkness glide.

Night after night they come,
Telling me wonders with their speaking eyes,
And I—as one quite dumb—
Can only by my countenance give replies.

How well they understand
Life's weary prayer—its hard and pitiless cross,
The great schemes nobly planned,
The feverish hope—the trembling risk—the loss.

In every human breast,
A passionate longing for the Infinite springs;
A never-ending quest
Of the Immortal for its heavenly wings.

And these pure visitors,
Though we deny them, love us none the less;
Unasked, they pass our doors,
And are for us Heaven's holy Witnesses.

THINGS.

San Francisco, Saturday, October 29, 1864.

IT is a wonder to me that no one has ever written or sung the advantages of being a fool. It would, of course, require a good deal of time to enumerate them—more than I can spare from the duties which occupy and fill my busy life—but a reputation awaits the man who first grapples the theme and treats it properly. Show me the man who is not restrained by ideas, and I will show you one to whom happiness and success in life are certain. When the multitude awake to an appreciation of this fact, you will see the present popular song so amended that the burden will be:

I'd choose to be a booby!

Instances certainly have been known where men have overcome the disadvantage of being originally endowed with intelligence, and the additional misfortune of having an education subsequently thrust upon them; but they are lamentably rare.

I find no fault with this world; it is an excellent world in its way—especially if one takes into account the fact that it is only an experiment. But to my thinking it is eminently susceptible of improvement—so much so, that the original mould might as well be broken and cast away and a new patent applied for. Nature is quite as progressive as art. To illustrate what I mean, the curious in matters of research will remember that water was made first, wine next, and that whisky came last of all. In like manner, man was first created; woman was the result of a second experiment. Few will deny that the woman was an improvement, but the full measure of adaptability to life and happiness in life was not reached until a fool was born.

Without amplifying this part of the subject further, I will simply remark that the woman was an improvement on the man, and that the fool was an improvement on the woman—casting both into the shade of their own vine and fig leaf. When this whole round world is peopled by fools everybody will be happy and rich—and that this consummation will soon be reached I confidently predict, for the world is verging towards it rapidly.

Then we shall have the Golden Age that poets have prated about, when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together. For it is tolerably certain that no lamb would lie down with a lion unless it were a fool, and if it did, I hold that the lion would be a fool not to eat it!

So much for so much. Certainly something can be said on the other side. While I claim that my rhinoceros has a hide that is impervious to fleas and bullets, it may be urged on the other hand that he can never enjoy the pleasure of being tickled. But this to my thinking does not fairly make a stand-off. For the tickling doesn't last long, and the bullet does. That's my argument! And to those who disagree with me, I can only say, in conclusion, that there is no accounting for tastes, but that I'd rather be a rhinoceros than a dear gazelle, any day. and that I'd choose to be a Mersey Ram sooner than either.

(Speaking of these rams, what is the difference between a Southdown Ram and a Ram down South? No answer is expected, and it must be distinctly understood that this whole sentence is in parenthesis.)

Anything to break the monotony of everyday existence, to vary the dead-wall of view upon which our life-windows look out! If in this whole community there be a man, woman or child who is at times seized and controlled by an irresistible desire to do something inorganic, to become for the moment a Disturber of the Public Peace. to stand, figuratively speaking, upon his, her, or its head and flourish his, her, or its feet in the air with a perfect disregard of and for what people may say or think, let that Dear Being stand by my side and say so, and we'll be friends forever. It is this wheel. ever revolving in its one miserable rut, that worries and bothers me: I'm tired of being Ixion. It is useless to tell me that this feeling is wicked, because I am prepared to admit any proposition of that kind in advance. If pressed on the subject I don't know but that I'd admit that I myself am wicked, desperately wicked, and capable of breaking more commandments in a less space of time than any one else in town. I'll admit anything, in fact, if people will only leave off asking me why I do this, and why I don't do that; but it is this constant bully-ragging and badgering that kills.

When life is done and the books are closed, each will have his own account to settle, and somehow it seems to me that mine will be complicated and mixed enough, anyway, without other people interfering and attempting to make alterations and false entries in my ledger.

SOMETHING ABOUT THE RACES.

In one point of view—a Bay View, of course—William Williamson may be regarded as a public benefactor. He gets up races; the most extraordinary and puzzling races that ever were heard of in the world, races that puzzle one's ingenuity to determine how to bet, and which have this one peculiarity about them—the more you study about it, the more you don't know, and either way you are likely to lose your money.

Of such a character was the race of Wednesday, when the little gray mare Unknown went against the well-known horse Pacific—both pacers—mile heats, the best three in five, to harness.

It was known that Pacific was fast, and his time stood on record much inside of any public performance of the little mare's. But then this latter had won every race she attempted, developing a bottom and a come-in-on-the-home-stretch capacity rare in pacers and surprising to every one on the ground. It was hinted that her backers knew what they were about, and that in private she had made time that made the man in the coal-yard, as well as the man in the wagon, stand on his head. So the knowing ones shook their heads, and very few knew which way to bet. But everybody determined to go out and see the result, and everybody went.

Now there are several ways to go out to the Bay View track. The most economical way is to go a-foot; the slowest and most democratic is to go in an omnibus, but the nicest way is to go with a buggy and pair.

Had I been Adam I could have resisted Eve when she came at me with an apple, but a "pair" would have brought me—especially had there been a buggy in the bargain.

Here I wish to introduce the Fashion Stables, kept by Porter & Covey. With no disrespect to the many other excellent stables in town, I do think that these are decidedly the best on the coast, and that when the improvements present and contemplated are completed, they will be the equal of any that this continent affords. It has always been remarked by strangers that better horses are kept on livery in San Francisco than can be found in stables anywhere else in the United States. If any doubt this let them go to Porter and Covey, either or both, take them to one side, and appeal to those better feelings which lie dormant in every horse man's nature for a team that will disgrace neither contracting party—and take what is given you, asking no questions and telling no lies. If a field-day is coming off, it is advisable to "speak" a few days in advance, as otherwise the chances are that you get nothing. If you happen to find yourself on the road with a pair of compact "chunky" little sorrels before you, and a Brewster buggy under you, call yourself fortunate. For a better driving team no man need ask for. Easy on the bit, honest as the day is long. and striking their gait at once without the persuasion of that long oat which grows at the driver's right hand, commend me to those little sorrels for all the driving I want to do on this coast. Only one thing interferes to prevent my buying them out-and-out, and this is a difficulty connected with the payment—slight, it is true, but sufficient to materially interfere with the trade.

But to return to the track. In compliment to the occasion the proprietor, familiarly known known as "The Old War Horse," appeared on Wednesday in a new hat –discarding the traditional white one of antiquity—his hair cut and trimmed down to fighting length. As a special novelty, too, on that day he varied his usual drink from brandy and ice, taking brandy clear—not, as he remarked, because he didn't like ice, but simply because it occupied room in the tumbler.

Every one was on the ground that day. "Podgers" was there with sloe-black horses—or, as some said, black slow horses—looking remarkably unhappy because he couldn't touch the sorrels—even when driven by a lady. He manifested his disappointment and vexation by making a number of very bad puns, which you will probably find embalmed like flies in amber, amid the "Happenings of the Weak." For instance, he maliciously took the hand of the lady I had the honor of driving in his, and, pressing it with that grace and fervor which is thought nothing of in a married man though unpardonable in a single one, asked her in dulcet tones whether she wore light gloves because she had taper fingers.

(It will be seen that the joke comes in on the juxtaposition of "light" and "taper"—a taper being a wax light which was in vogue before the introduction of gas into bed-chambers.)

Fillmore was n't on the ground, but Jim Moore was: he held a "proil" and drew on the mare, but did n't "fill," you see. Whipple, too, backed the gray. I asked him early in the race how it was going. "Oh," he replied, "I've got Confidence—I've got Confidence!" I asked Jim in the evening how the team came out, and he told me a little accident had happened to the whipple-tree; so for the future lynch-pins will take the place of terrapins, I suppose.

Strongly impressed in favor of the little mare, I didn't thoroughly awaken until Porter took the reins over the horse, and then it did begin to look dusty. Every one knew that Ferguson would drive the gray for all she had in her, for his driving won the previous race when she was matched against Fillmore, but Porter only drives once or twice in a hundred years, and when he does it means something. The result was that Pacific won the race and the money—the mare, singularly enough, not getting a single heat.

Collier went out buggy and returned sulky.

The only other notable feature of the affair was the sale of a little cob called The Widow's Mite, for the benefit of the Christian Commission. This mite was put in, probably, as a necessary adjunct to the Great Sanitary Cheese.

Widows might!—is it not sad to think that very often they won't?

OTHER THINGS.

I should have premised this article by explaining that it is written at the request of the military Editor of The Californian. In reply to his request I was afraid to say that I had nothing to write about, lest he should echo, "Nothing to write about! Right about face! You've got plenty of that!"

The week has been one of work to me, and it is pleasant to think that to-morrow is Sunday, when we shall do no work, neither our man-servant nor our maid-servant, nor the Broom Ranger that is within our gates.

Let me here explain that, notwithstanding the story to the contrary, I am not a Broom Ranger, though I have a friend who is. Mrs. Adams, the house-keeper at the Occidental, is President of a regiment of them; they go ranging through the halls, making a confounded rattling with their brooms every morning, and I'm surprised that Gen. McDowell should allow it while he occupies a room in the house. As for my principles, I think that any woman's broom is better than her company.

Furthermore, I'm in favor of the Union as it Was!

Some one—whether it was the Bulletin or Kuzzilbash, I do not exactly remember—remarked the other evening that peace was near at hand. I'm afraid it's the same kind of peace we've had all along—a piece de resistance—but I hope not, for no one believes it is time the rebellion was suppressed more sincerely than I do myself.

How remorselessly the red reaper goes on his way. Verily, it is well said that "All flesh is grass," for are we not "cradled" in our infancy, and then does not Time cut us down with his scythe?

By the way, I didn't see how remarkably clever the preceding sentence is until it was half written. It cuts both ways. An unpremeditated pun should be forgiven as kindly as any other unpremeditated sin.

Let me here confess to an offence which I had in my heart—but never committed. When the whale was lying on the ocean beach I did want to drive some unsuspecting friend out there and show it to him, remarking that it was my oil-ledge. He would, of course, have asked to see the oars—I would have pointed to the fellow's fins. In the innocence of his soul he would, perhaps, have gone on to inquire how they were worked. To that I intended to say: We smelt 'em! but the chance never occurred—time didn't serve, although the tide did, and the whole thing would have been lost to the world had it not been for this publication of it.

Some day I intend to write an article on the many good things unsaid and unwritten—the crystals of the mind, or rather the bright, brilliant bubbles, that form and vanish. And I also intend to write one upon WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN SAID HAD ONE ONLY THOUGHT IN TIME. For very excellent things are thought of when it is all too late to say them. One might improve Whittier's charming couplet in Maud Muller, by changing it to read thus:

Oh, of all sad thoughts when the moment is fled,
Tho saddest is this: What I might have said!

This wit that comes afterwards is called, by the French, l'esprit d'escalier, or "staircase wit." As an instance of it: at dinner the other day I was asked if I'd have a slice of Westphalia ham. I said yes, and ate it with singularly good appetite, until it occurred to me how much better it would have been had I inquired whether or not it was a Wide-West-failure ham.

I have not time to write more at present. In fact, I've snatched this moment of relaxation from time that should of right have been devoted to the perfection of an important invention with which I am busily occupied. Does any one want to know what it is? Listen:

I am inventing a new kind of boot-jack. It is calculated not only to pull off one's boots, but also to put him to bed, tuck him up carefully, and blow out the candle.

But a great deal of care will have to be had in its use. It only works satisfactorily with those who mind their own business. If others attempt to operate with it, it suddenly kicks them down stairs, and bolts the door. This is the only drawback to its coming into a very general use and making the fortune of the inventor. It is unnecessary to say that I never expect to sell many of the machines on this coast, but those wanting one can address—enclosing a postage stamp—

SORROWS OF WERTHER.

WERTHER had a love for Charlotte
Such as words could never utter;
Would you know how first he met her?
She was cutting bread and butter.

Charlotte was a married lady,
And a moral man was Werther,
And for all the wealth of Indies,
Would do nothing for to hurt her.

So he sighed and pined and ogled,
And his passion boiled and babbled,
Till he blew his silly brains out,
And no more by it was troubled.

Charlotte, having seen his body
Borne before her on a shutter,
Like a well-conducted person,
Went on cutting bread and butter.—[Thackeray.

THE ADVENTURES OF A LADY IN SEARCH OF A HORSE.

NOW there might have been just visible to the naked eye of an ordinary mortal, not bent upon reading aright the riddle of that impassible countenance, the sign of a latent chuckle hovering round the corners of the mouth, which one of the "close observers," so often called to the aid of the story-teller and the novelist, would have traced at once to some mysterious cause, deep hidden in the portly bosom of the man; hut as the quiet country village in question afforded neither sage nor philosopher so profound, and recognized Mr. Wells only in his haughty official capacity, the secrets of the human breast were not in this instance doomed to be betrayed, and the words which might have revealed their import to the "carnest inquirer" were muttered to the empty air.

"So the wind lies that way, does it?" he observed twice, when indulging in the habit of absent and pre-occupied people, of talking to himself—"so the wind lies that way;" and that he employed a metaphor, while making this profound statement for his own personal edification, would have been apparent to the aforesaid "close observer," or patent-novelist-human-breast-penetrator, from the fact that his eyes were bent upon the ground at his feet, and that the gilt weathercock on the church steeple before him was not called upon, in either instance, either to warrant or corrohorato the announcement.

The advertisement, the wording of which had been so carefully considered by the inmates of Park Side Cottage, was in time for insertion the same week in the columns of the Greyminster Herald, and from that date it must be allowed that the "parties" in question entered upon a new phase of existence, and became subject to the anomalous infliction of a *daily night*mare, in the shape of horses with three legs to go upon, horses with two, and horses with none; of horses too high and horses too low; of high-conraged horses, whose grooms could not hold them; aud of lean and hungry horses, that might have formed models for Don Quixote's Rosinante; of high-stepping carriage, and even hrougham horses; and of low, shuffling ponies; of youug horses; of old horses; of bay horses; of dun horses; of iron-grey, and chestnut horses; of had horses; of vicious horses; of lame horses; of used-up horses; of horses of every style, stamp and condition, that could be utterly and entircly useless to a young lady in delicate health, who wished to indulge in a daily canter round the home lanes and commons, in accordance with the adviee of her shrewd London physician.

"Let us decide upon buying the next that comes, that seems in the least likely to do," said Gloriana, at last, wearied with the daily and almost hourly arrival of the regimeuts of screws that offered themselves for the iuspection of four pair of eager eyes, all equally ignorant and inexperienced, and all equally determiued not on any account to be done. As shc spokc, the door opened, and the butler announced the arrival of another man, and another horse, "or cob, as hc calls it," he further condescended to explain; for it must be acknowledged that the temper of Mr. Wells had undergone a severe ordeal, and his dignity had heen much compromised, hy the endurance of unseemly chaff and ridicule from low-minded individuals belonging to the genus groom.

"Let us have round the horse, or cob, then, or whatever he likes to call it," said Gloriana, languidly. And in compliance with her request, an essentially "useful animal," accompanied hy a scampish and very horsey-looking attendant, soon made his appearance at the hall door. "The cob" was not at all a bad shape, compact, made for strength, and in size something between a horse and a pony, as his uame denoted. His hairy legs, however, and coarse head, showed his underbreeding, and detracted much from his merits in the eyes of the ladies.

It was evident that Mr. Wells strongly affected him: and a dose of flattery, not too finely drawn, from the broken-down horsedealer, did more than he would have willingly acknowledged towards securing his good word for the cob.

"I don't like his head," observed Miss Applegarde, objectively; "it is so large and clumsy-looking."

"Large, ma'am, do you call it?" said the man, with an air of well-feigned surprise. And then measuring, through a half-closed but infinitely cunning glance, the amount of flatness with which he had to deal, he gathered up all the effrontery of his nature, and rode over the last fence between the cob, and Mr. Wells's good graces in this remarkable and original sentence: "Why, any oue that knows about an oss,—and here he winked knowingly at the butler, to insinuate that he was included in the respectable category,—"any one that knows ahout an oss, knows that his strength lies in his head. This here cob is the strongest and the 'andsomest in England: and it would he no use of my ahusing him to you, sir, because I can see with 'alf an eye that you knows what an oss is."

Now, Mr. Wells, although a man of exalted mind and unimpeachahle integrity, was a mortal man afer all, and like other mortals found it impossible to resist the influence of the flattery that had not a leg to stand upon.

If the horse dealer of broken-down appearance had presumed to remark upon the glitter of the family plate, or to enlarge upon the value of the receipt for plate-powder, which had been handed down as an heirloom from father to son for three generations, the vulnerable point in Mr. Wells's nature would have remained untouched—he would have seen through and despised the attempt upon his understanding at once. But to he told opeuly, and by implication, that "he knew what a horse was," seeing that he knew nothing whatever about horses in general, or any horse in particular, was the little pebble out of the brook against which, properly propelled, his giant strength was as nought.

Flatter a beautiful, foolish woman upon her intellect, and a plain, clever woman upon her good looks; tell your literary friend, of undeveloped muscularity, that he is first-rate across country, and your sporting friend, who can barely spell, that he would write brilliant articles, and the grossness of the flattery will neither be resented nor perceived, but, on tho contrary, it will be imbibed with the greatest relish and gusto.

It is so with frail humanity generally; nor did Mr. Wells in this instance belie his mortal origin. His heart opened towards the man, aud to'vards the strong but ugly brute who was the the object of eulogy; and he assumed in their behalf his most pompous and oracular manner as he slowly pronounced the emphatic sentence—

"I think this is decidedly the hest animal we have seen, ma'am:" while his eyes wandered with unwonted admiration from the short, thick legs, to the long carcase and clumsy head of the "'andsomest cob in England."

The gentle, ladylike, still pretty widow was out upon the lawn, surveying this last specimen of horse-flesh which had been presented to her discriminating gaze, through her eye-glass, and she said, when thus appealed to, with the candor that was natural to her—

"I cannot say that I think him pretty; but if he is quiet and gentle I shall be satisfied, as Miss Applegarde has had no experience in riding as yet; but is ordered to do it for her health," she added, turning, as she spoke, to address the horse-dealer, with that trnstful and appealing gaze, which is natural to a fond mother when her child's health and safety are the matters at issue, and which might have possibly touched the "better nature" of the hardened ruffian in question, for he replied fluently enough—

"It was what I thought, ma'am, when I seed the advertisement; and ses I to myself, Why there's the hrown cob, Brutus, as I had off General Hunter, as will carry the lady like a lamh. No wice or nousense about him; warranted sound, neat as paint, and a bargain at forty guineas, which is his price, and dirt cheap too at the money."

"I should really think he is worth it, mamma," said Gloriana, decisively: "we have looked at so many, and I don't think we have seen anything more likely to suit us. Suppose that you write a cheque, and let the man leave the horse."

The moment of decision, however, was always more or less an easy one to Mrs. Applegarde; and at such times the feeling of her unprotected state, and of her "lone and lorn" condition, was wont to intrude upou her with melancholy force.

"If we had only been ahle to consnlt sciue one who really understands about horses," she began, nervously and unconsciously, but rudely trampling under foot the new-born vanity in the breast of Mr. Wells: "it strikes me forcibly that there is a wicked expression about the eye of this horse, and I dou't quite like the way in which he moves his ears about when you approach him."

To this remark the horse-dealer vouchsafed no direct reply, but making as though he were about to lead the injured Brutus off at once, he said, addressing himself to the butler, "If the lady's no huyer, I can't waste my time; the cob's a real good un, and there's twenty after him as it is."

"I don't presume to offer an opinion," was the majestic reply; and the tone and manner in which it was made, awoke Mrs. Applegarde to the conviction, that the feelings of her faithful domestic had been lacerated in some vital part, and that nothing but the most abject humiliation on her side would pour balm into the cruel wound.

Once aware of the fact, she hastened with her usual kindness to soothe the fceliugs that her thoughtless words had ruffled, and to make the amende honorable by saying at once, "It is your opiniou that we must act upon; and it is with Mr. Wells that you must deal," she added, as the horse-dealer maintained a somewhat sulky and impertinent demeanor, while awaiting the result of the conference. "If he approve of the horse I am quite willing to purchasc him."

It is scarcely necessary to add, after this, that the deal was concluded, and that the renowned Brutus was left upon the hands of the ladies of Park Side Cottage, to whom the question thus became a matter of paramouut importance, "What they could make of him?"

Mr. Wells himself exhibited a certain amount of nervous agitation, when the last glimpse of the figure of the horse-dealer had told itself off in the direction of the nearest pubhc; but recovering his usual dignity by a strong effort of will, he knowingly avoided the responsibility of handling the cob himself, and assuming a magisterial air, commanded the small hoy, who did what country people call "odds and ends" in the house and garden, to lead the horse to the stable, which had heen ready prepared for the advent of an animal of some sort or another.

"Your father understands about horses, Bill," he began, thus paving the way to a negotiation which he had had in his mind since the introduction of the horse subject at Park Side; "just ask him to step up this evening, and have a glass of ale, will you?"

CHAPTER II.

HOW THE HORSE TURNED OUT WHOSE "STRENGTH LAY IN HIS HEAD."

In the course of a day or two everything was preparcd for the event of Gloriana's first ride; and Brutus in a bran new saddle and hridle, and Gloriana in a bran uew habit and hat, formed the nucleus of an admiring crowd of small urchins, who were attracted on the way from school by the novel sight of Miss Applegarde mounted on her new purchase, which seemed likely to afford her some little tronble in the process of "making" which she had looked forward to with such laudahle zeal. Indeed he appeared, as far as their juvenile faculties were capahle of discriminating, to have a very strong will of his own, in furtherance of which he brought his ponderous head to bear, in all its hoasted strength, upon the young lady's weak and inexperienced hauds.

"I shall be tired to death," shc said to herself when the tnssle was at last over, and the cob's head turned, sorely against his will, in the direction of the common, which extended for nearly a mile, and a view of which was commanded from the drawing-room windows of the eottage.

She was, indeed, almost tired to death as it was, for she was far from strong; but the worst was still to come. She had not hitherto attempted to urge the animal out of a walking pace, and was recruiting her strength for the operation of "putting him through his paces," which she hoped to do with immense éclat before the admiring gaze of her mother and sister, of Mr. Wells and the boy, and of the boy's father, "w o uuderstood all about horses," and whose services Mr. Wel s had, iudeed, finally secured, in order that the cob might do credit to the establishment, and not by his bad condition or slovenly appointments lead to the installation of that hateful functionary, a regular bona fide groom.

"Yon must canter first, you know," said Gloriana, condescendingly, to the brown cob Brutus, who was so devoid of birth and breeding as to reply to this conciliatory address on the part of his mistress, which was accompanied by a corresponding action of hand and foot, by a resolute shake of his uncouth head, and by a decided downward inclination of that appendage in the direction of his fore feet. "My goodness! I do believe he's going to kick," said Gloriana; and the observation in this instance was not directed to the horse, but wrung from her in the agony of apprehension which the certain conviction brought to her mind. But Brutus rested satisfied with indulging his playful mood by a caper or two, which, although comparatively innocent in the eyes of lookers-on, shook Gloriana in her saddle to an alarming extent, for the movements of the cob were rough and quick, and there was no manner of spring in the well-developed joints and muscles, which had excited such admiration in the breast of Mr. Wells! Once set in motion, Brutus vouchsafed to proceed to the far end of the common in a tolerable steady canter; every now and then, however, breaking into a heavy and dislocating trot, which threw Gloriana's light figure high into the air, and caught it again at the rchound, with a strength and jerkiness which had au exhausting rather than an exhilarating effect on the nerves and muscles of his rider. Gloriana was not at all devoid of the English quality—pluck; and once embarked in an enterprise, it was not in her nature to give in. "I have no doubt that it will do me good—in time," she said, spasmodically, between the jerks, when weak physical human nature was pleading rather hard to be let off the severe ordeal of being pounded to death on the back of a regular bone-crnsher, and suggesting the abandonment of the whole plan in despair. And it was doing her good, inasmuch as it was employing the faculties both of body and mind—rousing her to exertion and dispelling the morbid fancies which had been taking such hold of her young imagination. The clephantine gambols of Brutus had accomplished this, if they had done nothing more; but his paces and action had proved so rough and tiring, that as Gloriana dismounted from his back by means of a chair, which the ever-watchful Wells had brought for her accommodation, she turned suddenly pale, and then reeled and fell from the chair into his arms in a dead, heavy swoon.

"Take the brute away, can't you?" the butler said, with much irritation, to the man of understanding with regard to the noble animal; "take him away to the stable. If this is to he the consequence of exercise upon four legs, I think two's a better number; and I don't put so much faith in Sir Erasmus as I did. Don't be alarmed, ma'am," he continued, as he bore his insensible burden into the drawing-room, and deposited it upon the sofa; "it's only the haction of that erc Brutus that has been too much for Miss Gloriana; and she so weak, poor thing! I doubt whether she'll he able to stand it now."

Poor Mrs. Applegarde looked as pale as Gloriana, hut Kate, whose presence of mind never forsook her, began immediately to busy herself about the prostrate form of her sister—chafing her hands and feet, bathing her white face and brows with eau de Cologne, and applying smelling-salts to her nostrils.

"She's a-coming to, now," said Wells, as the first tender flnsh of color in her cheeks bespoke the return of suspended animation; and the poor mother, who was trembling in her helpless anxiety, stooped to kiss her forehead, saying, in a flutter of lachrymose agitation—

"It's all that nasty horse, I know. Sir Erasmus made a great mistake, and forgot how weak the poor child was——. But never mind, my dear, you shall not attempt to ride again; and it will, indeed, be quite a relief to my mind. I said all along there was something wicked about its eyes and the way in which it put its ears back when you approached it; and after it jumped about with you in that dreadful way on the common, I could not bear to look out again. Kate told me that you had come through the front gate all right, and the next thing I beheld was Wells carrying you in in a fainting state——. But never mind, my dear, you shall not ride again; and we'll get rid of that dreadful horse as soon as possible."

"Indeed, mamma," said Gloriana, raising herself on her elhow on the sofa cushion, "it is not at all a dreadful horse, and I enjoyed my ride immensely; I hope to ride again to-morrow and every day; and I do not intend to disgrace myself in this way again. After all, there was nothing wonderful in my fainting, for I have heard men say"—and here she blnshed slightly, for the sayings and doings of men had been hitherto little canvassed amongst the gentle tenants of Park Side Cottage—"I have heard men say that they are often regularly knocked up with the first day's hunting: and of course a first ride is the samo thing to me. I am all right now," she added; hut it must be confessed that her looks did not quite bear out the assertion; and she was obliged before very long to own to a more than usual feeling of fatigne and exhaustion, and to retire unwillingly to bed. But the spell, it would appear, was already working, for she did all she could to arouse herself, and fought against the languor which before this memorable ride sho had perhaps in some measure fostered and encouraged.

In the course of the evening Mr. Wells was summoned to an interview with the man of understanding with regard to the stable economy of the hrown cob Brutus, which ended, I am sorry to say, in his becoming a second time a dupe, through the medium of the unerring shaft of flattery, directed with faultless aim to the vulnerable point in his manly breast. That the quadruped in question was likely to consume a certain amount of hay and corn, and that he "lay upon straw," was the extent of his information upon the subject under discussion, and he was, therefore, as might be supposed, helpless as a child in the hands of a man who possessed a large share of the quality of cuteness, generally supposed to appertain to intellects sharpened on the grindstone of a knowledge of horse-flesh.

The spoils of the unconscious cob had, indeed, formed the corner-stone of a very pretty castle in the air, which had been run up, regardless of expense, in the fertile brain of the worthy known to the village by the suggestive cognomen of "Knowing Ned;" and he blessed the happy fate that had cast into his net such an unmitigated "flat" as the worthy butler, who became in his hands an easy, although unconscious, tool.

"I'll do justice to that 'oss, Mr. Wells," he began "purvided you see me through it in the matter of wages. I understands all about osses, and did from a boy; but if I undertakes groom's work, I must have groom's pay—barring the livery, which I don't ask for, seeing I can't ride since I threw out a splint in my near leg, which you knows, Mr. Wells, as well as I can tell you, and that I speak the truth. There's my old 'ooman, as attends church reglar, and always did from a child, would tell you the same any day on her Bible oath."

"We don't want no grooms in livery here," replied the butler with so much eagerness that, by an over-liberality in the matter of negatives, he destroyed the force of his own remark. "But the horse must be attended to; and I'll speak to my mistress on the subject. Have a glass of ale, my good man, and look to the cob till further orders, will you?"

And it was in this manner that the man of understanding with regard to horses, the father of the boy who did the odds and ends of work at Park Side Cottage, who went by the name of "Knowing Ned" in the village, inserted the thin end of the wedge of his own fortunes into the tempting aperture which the false diplomacy of Mr. Wells with regard to an irregular groom offered to his acute perceptions.

"I sees my way to fifty pounds, if I sees it to a shillin," he said to himself, as he swallowed a refreshing draught of his patron's home-brewed ale. "The first thing I'll do will be to swop the brown cob for the old mare Blind Bess. If Miss Applegarde rides him to-morrow she won't the day after—unless I am very much mistaken, leastways."

What diabolical plot was hatching under the skull of knavish contour appertaining to "Knowing Ned," to perpetrate on the morrow with regard to his young mistress and the brown cob Brutus, we will leave the next chapter of these Adventures to reveal, only hinting that it was one which appeared to afford him unwonted satisfaction, for he chuckled to himself a low, cunning chuckle as he littered down Brutus for the night, observing to that stolid quadruped during the operation, "You are a nice oss, you are; but you ain't fit for a lady noways."

The Enoch Arden of Real Life.—The Montreal Herald gives the following report of a case, "Jean Hyacinthe Cordier vs. Mary Jane Cordier," which was recently before the Supreme Court of Canada. It appears that in December, 1849, the plaintiff was a young jeweller, about nineteen years of age, and the defendant was a dressmaker, of twenty-three years of age. He was French and she was English. The consequence of their intimacy led to the arrest of the plaintiff by the defendant on the charge of seduction. While in the station-house a settlement was had, and the parties were married in a cell by a Catholic priest. Immediately after the ceremony the plaintiff left, and, as alleged by the defendant, ran away secretly. She heard nothing till eighteen months ago, when she was informed he had died in the mines of California. About two years after, not having heard from Cordier, and in the full belief that he was dead, she married Mr. John Price, by whom she had five children. Ten years after her second marriage, and fourteen years after her first marriage, Mr. Cordier turned up. He had emigrated to California, as he claimed, with the knowledge of Mary. He had there opened a restaurant, prospered, and now returned home rich to claim his bride. Finding that his wife had re-married, he brought a suit for divorce. He alleged that the rumors of his death had been started by his wife herself, and that she had never made any inquiries respecting him. The wife admitted the marriage with Price, but claimed that she had done so, believing that Cordier was dead; that he had abandoned her for a number of years, during all of which she had no tidings of him. The case was referred to a referee, who reported in favor of plaintiff. To this report the defendant took exceptions. It was claimed that plaintiff had no standing in court, the well-known rule of equity requiring a suitor to come into court with clean hands, having no application in this case, inasmuch as he had abandoned his lawful wife for fifteen years, and only took the present steps from malice, with a view to revive the dead scandal, ruin an inoffensive woman, blast the reputation of innocent children, and entirely alter the social relations of Mr. Price and his family. The plaintiff denied that he had abandoned his wife, but claimed that they had been regularly separated, in pursuance of an agreement between them before the marriage took place. The judge directed that the report of the referee must be confirmed, and granted a divorce to plaintiff.

The Prince Imperial.—The Emperor and Prince Imperial, Prince Napoleon, and Prince Humbert of Italy are safely housed at St. Cloud. The Imperial Prince rose after dinner at the camp, and addressing the colonel of the 97th said: "Mon colonel, I come to report myself. I have orders to join your regiment. Shall I fall in at once?" His Imperial Highness also "added to the harmony of the evening" by volunteering a song. He gave them—

> "Tiens, voici ma pipe, voila mon briquet;
> Et quand La Tulipe fait le noir trajet,
> Que tu sois la seule dans le régiment
> Avec la brule-gueule de ton cher amant," with great applause. If "entering young" makes a soldier, Napoleon IV. should be worthy of his great historic name.—Paris Letter.

Readers of newspapers in the North will have been somewhat startled on reading a paragraph, very similar to the following, which has been going the round of the Manchester and Scotch journals: "It is rumored in certain quarters that no less a lady than her Majesty the Queen is the authoress of 'Margaret Denzil,' in the Cornhill, and that the copy has been actually seen in the handwriting of Mr. Arthur Helps, with occasional touches from the royal finger. The same story has been attributed, and that in well-informed circles, to Mr. Wilkie Collins and Miss Thackeray" How amusing all this must have been to Mr. Charles Allston Collins, the actual author! The novel will be completed in October, when it will probably re-appear in the three volume or library form.

THE LAST HOURS OF PRINCE ALBERT.

THERE has reached us from abroad a most interesting extract from a letter which was written by a member of the Queen's household shortly after the death of Prince Albert. The extremely confidential position which the writer held at the time not only gives the assurance of perfect reliability, but invests the following lines with a very special interest. After describing the griefs and fears of the whole household for the Queen, the writer speaks of the personal loss sustained in the death of Prince Albert: "How I shall miss his conversation about the children! He used often to come into the school room to speak about the education of the children, and he never left me without my feeling that he had strengthened my hands and raised the standard I was aiming at. Nothing mean or frivolous could exist in the atmosphere that surrounded him: the conversation could not be trifling if he was in the room. I dread the return of spring for my dear lady. It was his favorite time of the year—the opening leaves, the early flowers, and fresh green were such a delight to him; and he so loved to point out their beauties to his children that it will be terrible to see them without him. The children kept his table supplied with primroses, which he especially loved. The last Sunday he passed on earth was a very blessed one for the Princess Alice to look back upon. He was very ill and very weak, and she spent the afternoon alone with him, while the others were in church. He begged to have his sofa drawn to the window, that he might see the sky and the clouds sailing past. He then asked her to play to him, and she went through several of his favorite hymns and chorals. After she had played some time, she looked round and saw him lying back, his hands folded as if in prayer, and his eyes shut. He lay so long without moving that she thought he had fallen asleep. Presently he looked up and smiled. She said: 'Were you asleep, dear papa?' 'Oh no,' he answered, 'only I have such sweet thoughts.' During his illness, his hands were often folded in prayer; and when he did not speak, his serene face showed that the 'happy thoughts' were with him to the end. The Princess Alice's fortitude has amazed us all. She saw from the first that both her father and mother's firmness depended on her firmness, and she set herself to the duty. He loved to speak openly of his condition, and had many wishes to express. He loved to hear hymns and prayers. He could not speak to the Queen of himself, for she could not bear to listen, and shut her eyes to the danger. His daughter saw that she must act differently, and she never let her voice falter or shed a single tear in his presence. She sat by him, listened to all he said, repeated hymns, and then, when she could bear it no longer, would walk calmly to the door, and then weeping rush away to her room, returning soon with the same calm and pale face without any appearance of the agitation she had gone through. I have had several interviews with the poor Queen since. The first time she said: 'You can feel for me, for you have gone through this trial.' Another time she said how strange it seemed, when she looked back, to see how much for the last six months the Prince's mind had dwelt upon death and the future state; their conversation had so often turned upon these subjects, and they had read together a book called Heaven our Home, which had interested him very much. He once said to her: 'We don't know in what state we shall meet again, but that we shall recognize each other and be together in eternity I am perfectly certain.' It seemed as if it had been intended to prepare her mind and comfort her—though of course it did not strike her then. She said she was a wonder to herself, and she was sure it was in answer to the prayers of her people that she was so sustained. She feared it would not last, and that times of agony were before her. She said: 'There's not the bitterness in this trial that I felt when I lost my mother—I was so rebellious then; but now I can see the mercy and love that are mixed in my trial.' Her whole thought now is to walk worthy of him, and her greatest comfort to think that his spirit is always near her, and knows all that she is doing."—Northern Whig.

Reckless Bathers.—A somewhat singular occurrence took place at Tynemouth on Wednesday last. It appears that a young lady, the daughter of a medical gentleman, entered one of the numerous bathing machines on the Long Sands. The young lady, on entering the machine, was duly cautioned by the owner, and also on her alighting in the sea, of the risk she would necessarily run by venturing too far out at that particular state of the tide and sea. Nothing daunted, however, she rushed heedlessly on, regardless of the shouts of her adviser, who, at length, when he found that persuasive measures were quite unavailing, mounted a horse, whip in hand, and rode to her rescue, threatening at the same time to apply it to the lady's shoulders, should she still persist in risking her life in the manner above stated, on which she hastily returned to the machine to dress, on making her exit from which she intimated that it would certainly be the last time she would patronize his bathing machines. Although so recently as Sunday last Mr. Falconer lost his life on the same sands, and his body has not yet been recovered, nothing will deter some people. The owner of the machine certainly had not recourse to the most refined measures by which to deter the fair bather; but there can be little doubt that her parents and relations would have infinitely preferred her having received a sound whipping rather than have heard of her death by drowning owing to her own folly and indiscretion.—Berwick Journal.

Hottentot Beauty.—Lady Duff Gordon says, in "Letters from the Cape": "I have fallen in love with a Hottentot baby here. Her mother is all black, with a broad face and soft spaniel eyes, and the father is Bastard; but the baby (a girl nine months old) has walked out of one of Leonardo de Vinci's pictures; I never saw so beautiful a child. She has huge eyes with the spiritual look he gives to them, and is exquisite in every way. When the Hottentot blood is handsome it is beautiful; there is a delicacy and softness about some of the woman which is very pretty, and the eyes are those of a good dog."

The Swiss Bear.—On the whole, Grandfather Blacktooth, as Bruin is popularly called in the Engadine, is of a comparatively mild, good-natured disposition, and, in a great degree, a vegetarian. Grass, herbs, roots and wild berries are the chief articles of his diet; but occasionally, when these fail, or when he is seized with a craving for richer meat, he makes a raid on the goats or sheep. One is known to have "lifted" fifteen sheep from the Sutz-alp, in the Eugadine, in a few days, although some oxen joined horns in a serried phalanx to defy the robber. Another destroyed twenty-nine on the Buffalora-alp, in 1858; while a third, in ten days, made away with seventeen in Zernetz. The bear rarely attacks cattle or horses, and when he does, is generally worsted, in spite of his great strength, of which some idea may be formed from the fact that he has been known to pull a cow out of a shed through the roof, and to drag a horse across a deep brook. His usual plan is to spring on the victim, and bite its neck till it sinks from loss of blood. Even goats and sheep he does not always dare to assail openly, preferring to pounce on them in a fog, or to drive them to the edge of a precipice, and then to make prize of those that fall over. Sometimes, however, he will batter in the door of a stable in order to prey upon the goats inside. Bruin's well-known fondness for honey and fruit has often led him to grief. Although his expeditions are seldom prolonged beyond ten or twenty hours from the time he starts from his den, the bear of the Engadine has, within the present century, penetrated at different times into the vineyards of the Pays de Vaud and the Valais, where his paws are exhibited as trophies in more than one chalet. Ants are relished by the bear as an agreeable acid whet, and are licked up greedily by his long tongue when he comes to a nest. Occasionally, too, he may be seen sitting gravely by the side of a stream, and knocking the trout dexterously out of the water with his heavy paw. The Swiss bear, however ravenous, never, it is said, attacks a man without provocation. When he meets a peasant, he generally stares at him and then trots off. A story is told of one amiable Grandfather, who, encountering a Little Red Ridinghood with a basket of strawberries, quietly helped himself, but did no harm to the little girl, who was too much terrified to run away.—All the Year Round.

Behind the Circus Scenes.—The behind the scenes of circus-dom is a quaint enough region. There is always a soupçon of that very peculiar zoological aroma indicative of the king of the forest. A great fire of coke burns brightly in a large iron funnel, placed in the centre of the vacant space (the extempore green-room). The fire is of great use for ventilating purposes, for there is always uppermost a strong perfume of damp saw-dust, wet litter, and horse-breath, with a faint indication of bad drainage and other miseries. The scene at the fire is motley enough. The lazy black servant, habited in the gorgeous oriental robe, is attentively chalking the pumps of Mademoiselle Aurelia, the tight-rope dancer and aseension-ist," who is adjusting her pink skirts preparatory to taking her "turn." A medical student is making hot love to Madame Fracatelli, the lady-devil rider, who, as the bills tells us, "has been clothed with fame in all the capitals of Europe and Russia." The funny gentleman with the nodding queue or tail-piece looking waggishly over his whitened scalp, his nose buried in a pint of half-and-half, is one of the seven great clowns of the establishment—"that oracle of pungent satire, Mr. Henry White, surnamed the modern Touchstone." . . . In front all is ablaze with light and gaudy calico, and each acrobat and horseman seems to excel his neighbor in his leaps and bounds. The three hours of performance fly rapidly away, as artist after artist bounds into the ring. Trick acts, feats on the trapeze, revolving corkscrews, descending Mercuries, in short, all the puzzling acts of contortion incidental to the modern circus, are exhibited with a grace and dexterity, and with a firmness of nerve, which never fails.

Manners and Customs in Brazil.—A letter from Rio August 8, says:—"The public have been shocked by a most revolting business in Tuiz da Fora (Minas Seraes), where an English lady has been horsewhipped in the streets by a slave, who was employed by his master, one of the Brazilian upper classes, to do this. The lady's name is Cerqueira Luna, widow of a Brazilian diplomatic minister. She is poor, and has been educating young ladies. A trumpery quarrel between her son and a young Brazilian, living in Tuiz da Fora, caused a relative of this last to send a strong black, a slave, to horsewhip young Luna. His screams brought out his poor old mother, and the slave horsewhipped her also. Many brazilians where present, but from fear and terror of the powerful black no one interfered bodily; one is said to have called out for the black to stop, and the slave then turned upon him. It was about 3 P. M., and in the high street. The British Consul has taken up the matter earnestly; the English lady, a widow, is entitled to English protection. It is said that the Emperor has expressed his determination that justice shall be done in this horrid affair; the family of the slave's master is powerful, and you know already that the rule here is that money and power can procure an acquittal. This affair, I think, will excite a sensation in England."

Dr. Chalmers's eldest brother James was a very excellent person, but of a morose and eccentric temper. Among his crotchets, one was that Scotchmen in London were the greatest bores in life, always coming about one, and speaking about Scotland, and expecting what they called hospitality. When the Doctor was in London, in 1817, and the commotion about his preaching was naturally greatest among his own countrymen, this was all the more reason with James for keeping clear of the concern. Rather than be plunged into the Scottish element, he kept by himself the whole time, and never once went to hear his brother preach. He could not escape, however, hearing much about him, for the stir had penetrated even into his daily haunt, the Jerusalem Coffee-house.

"Well," said one of his merchant friends to him one day, wholly ignorant of the relationship, "have you heard this wonderful countryman and namesake of yours?"

"Yes," said James, somewhat dryly, "I have heard him."

"And what did you think of him?"

"Very little indeed," was the reply.

"Dear me!" said the astonished inquirer; "when did you hear him?"

"About half an hour after he was born."

HAPPENINGS OF THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, October 23d.

The week opens with a leaden aspect, threatening rain, but failing in the attempt. All the good people attended church, and all the wicked drove out to the Cliff to see Foster and his family of sea-lions, the latter appearing somewhat hoarse, and "Old Hundred" was not rendered in their usual good style. The old father of the flock pitched the key too high, and, becoming disgusted, pitched head-foremost into the sea, and was seen no more. He probably went down for divers reasons best known to himself.

The gathering at the Ocean House was large, and Dicky, in his best clothes and his hair in splendid curl, received and entertained his friends graciously, and the feasibility of the numerous projects for pumping Lake Merced into San Francisco was discussed. Many questions were asked as to whether the water was fresh or salt, but nobody proposed a trial of it. The fact that it had never been tasted during the several years people had been driving down there was proof conclusive that they did not go down there to drink water. The horses were the only people who had ever drank the element, and if asked if it was salt, would have answered neigh.

In town it was respectably quiet and orderly, and those who had friends to talk turkey to them dined out.

MONDAY, October 24th,

Opens with a dampness of pavements, the result of a little trial, by the clerk of the weather, of his sprinkling apparatus, to see if it would work well when called upon. The weak little shower that was ashamed to display itself by daylight laid the dust and purified the air from the perfume of numerous defunct cats and dogs that ornament our streets, and it braced up everybody to "make an effort" to be honest and respectable—be just to their fellow-men, and pay Billy Ralston their notes—who, by the way, cannot be said to be unobserving and take no note of time, a mighty short time though it be. May his days be long, even though he gives his friends but sixty!

Two brokers, for want of better business, proceed to break each others' heads, and convert Montgomery street into a gladiatorial arena. We are glad, however, to report that stocks were not affected by their fall. They will probably pay a small dividend to Judge Shepheard.

James Flattery, who has a bad habit of not being able to distinguish between meum and tuum, fined $50 for want of proper intelligence on that question.

Margaret Ryan took great pains to smash the window-panes of a neighbor: for making light of other people's property, she contributed $20 to the city's finances.

A Bee-ginning.—Ninety-one boxes of honey landed from a schooner. Every married lady is expected to sing out "Honey!" to her husband.

The Ellsworth Rifles, although a sober company, get "over the bay" on a target shoot.

Bridget O'Connor has a slight "brush" with Elizabeth Leonard, and "whacked" her over the head with a broom. Judge Shepheard swept the board.

The editorial corps of the Californian go to the Metropolitan to see the Indians, and were highly edified thereby. The gentlemen "savages" composing the troupe were appropriately dressed in long-tailed red woolen shirts, leggins, and inverted feather-dusters on their heads. In their performances they lacked action somewhat, and seemed to require a few inspirations of whisky to get up the enthusiasm. The scalping scene was a very clumsy affair, and the sealpee kicked with impatience at the slow process and might have had a hair-breadth escape as well as not. The gentleman from the dusty alkali and sage-brush region who performed the part of "The Coyote," evidently did not have that clear conception of the part that it required, and his rendering of it was somewhat open to criticism—especially the manner in which he administered his snaps. There may be a difference of opinion as to the mode of dressing the character: in this case the Coyote seemed to have been afflicted with the mange, and his tail had a tendency to pull out at the wrong time. The two daughters of Winnemucca were good, plump specimens of squaw life under the influence of three square meals a day, and there appeared to be very little "slack" in their breeches, and when they bowed, their rather brief skirt coat-tails stuck straight out in an angular manner, while their big toes turned in affectionately towards each other—which probably accounts for the name—one being called Woo-no-to(e)-na(ils)—the other, Pu(g)-nosa, or "the Sweet Smeller." The former translates "Lattice Flower," which argues a desire to climb into some brave's affections.

TUESDAY, October 25th.

The Emperor Norton, who is uniformly well dressed, comes out in a new uniform. The Emperor, although changing his habits often, never goes from bad to worse. It is to be hoped that this worthy hair apparent to a throne may be duly recognized and not thrown aside in these exciting times. The Emperor has proved to us clearly that he is regularly constituted Emperor of the United States under a Constitution made on purpose; and it doesn't agree with his constitution to have his claims as well as his drafts on Queen Victoria disregarded. His only offence, if he has any, is "rank," and though it be as odoriferous as the very whale itself that Foster knows he keeps solely for the noses of his guests, yet, should a proper deference and respect be shown one who is liable to greatness. As there appears to be a diversity of opinion on the merits of the two candidates for President, we propose the Emperor as a compromise, and vote that "the tieket."

The Police out in full force after a — brass band. Chief Burke drew them up in line in front of The Californian office, which compliment, we regret to say, we were not prepared to respond to in a spirited manner. On some other occasion we will be prepared to enter into a treat-eh?—not offensive and defensive. They presented a star appearauce and their ways are very taking.

The great race between Pacific and Unknown came off to-day. Pacific won in three straight heats; time, 2:31¼, 2:34¼, 2:39¼. Inigo goes, sees the elephant and tells his experience.

WEDNESDAY, October 26th.

Two cars run away with their car-goes and smash up, and smash several of the musicians coming from the cemetery. They were not calculating on such a quick movement, and, before they had time to note the fact, were pitched a key higher than they could sustain. Fiddles and noses were smashed.

George Kimball lost his "purp," a white canine mit a liver-colored spot on his forehead, and of the pointer persuasion. His forte is pointing a bone. Who has stolen the "Dorg?" Let not the man who did it preserve a dogged silence.

The pony sold at the race-track yesterday for the benefit of the Christian Commission—called the Widow's Mite—brought "mighty little," in comparison with the price it sold for at the Sacramento Fair.

Frank Pixley "speaks a piece." His text, "Abraham's cause."

Col. Billy Mulligan, for being found in a house that did not belong to him, under suspicious circumstances, was arrested. Eternal vigilance seems to be the price of the Colonel's liberty, and Chief Burke's Committee were too vigilant for his.

A beautiful sword, made by Barrett & Sherwood for Col. Robert Pollock, C. V., Camp Douglas, Salt Lake City, was forwarded yesterday. The Colonel will undoubtedly receive it in the course of time.

The first premium for the best lady rider at the Sacramento State Fair, awarded to Miss Lora Clark, and, that the others should not be disappointed, each one was presented with a silver cup. They paired off in happy couples.

Thomas Harmon, convicted of highway robbery, goes over the bay to inspect his new boarding-house. Likes it so well that he has concluded to stay three years, until this cruel war is over, and he be no longer subjected to the draft.

THURSDAY, October 27th.

The first artesian well in Northern Utah is down to a depth of 30 feet. Very well! If it is the "truth" they are digging for up that way they have a job before them, and must go mighty deep.

The village of Fredonia, N. Y., is said to be lighted by gas obtained by boring. We know any number of bores who are gassy enough to light this city, and make a respectable dividend of surplus stock beside.

The steamer Golden City arrives from Panama.

The ferry-boats Contra Costa and San Antonio bump noses, and make the splinters fly. Each had a guard out, but they did not have their eyes about them. Several dollars in the pockets of ship-carpenters, who are in favor of "strikes!"

FRIDAY, October 28th.

Bridget Atkinson, a believer in woman's rights, fined $20 for the privilege of airing her opinions in the Police Court, and showing her contempt for that useful institution.

The Shubrick propels a solid shot at the propeller Zodiac, which craft was out on a trial trip. They thought she was making a feint, and intended slipping out without consulting Collector James. She was "brought to" out of her feint, suddenly. The signs of the Zodiac in the present instance were unfavorable.

Sixteen gentlemen, who were born somewhere else, regret the circumstance and remedied the evil by the aid of the Fourth District Court, and were made natives and to our manner born.

A Broom Ranger calls at the office of The Californian in high dudgeon, expresses his dissatisfaction, and threatens discontinuing his paper if it don't change its politics. The question referred to Emperor Norton. A newspaper office a poor place to come to for "change."

Mining stocks looking up as the bullion comes down; and as soon as it rains, "dust" will be abundant. Bushels of quartz await pounding—the general method of putting miners upon their metal.

A lady writes us to inquire if Eph Leonard and Charley Smith, in default of getting wild geese, seek to make geese of people by fooling them with gun-wad lozenges, which shows a little inclination to make game of those two nice "birds." As the former gentleman is President of a Water Company and invites us to go out gunning on his reservoir occasionally, we fear any comments might result in our getting a "ducking" on the next occasion.

A brass band of brothers serenade The Californian office, but are seduced from their object by the proprietor of the saloon below, who offers to "treat," an invitation they accepted in the middle of "John Brown"—very shabby treatment. Surely he meant to treat The Californian also—tho sin of omission being greater than that of commission.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

KING JOHN was given by the Keans at Maguire's Opera House for the first time on Monday evening, to the usual large audience. The character of "King John" has been made an especial and careful study by Charles Kean, and, as rendered by him that evening, was admirable in conception and finish. The play is not one, however, that would please the general audience, and except the interview between "John" and "Hubert," where the murder of "Arthur" is artfully compassed, and the scene in which "Constance" betrays her bitter disappointment at the unexpected friendship which springs up between "John" and the "French King," the incidents are not of themselves sufficient to deeply affect the audience. Mrs. Kean's "Constance," it is hardly necessary to add, was perfect. Mayo as "Falconbridge," dressed and read his part capitally. On Wednesday evening Hamlet was performed for the first time this season. Many of the audience who were prepared to make that sacrifice of their physical ideal of the young prince, which the personation of the character by a gentleman of Mr. Kean's years would involve, expressed themselves as agreeably disappointed. The cotemporary press were loud in their praises of the talented actor and his wife in this play, and to their unanimous verdict the critic of The Californian must for the present concur, in the absence of a personal attendance. Some other performance claimed his time that evening, and not possessing a dual presence, missed the "inky cloak" and grave philosophy of the youthful Dane.

During the past week, at the Academy of Music, the Richings troupe have been making their separate and individual congé, beginning with the worthy director, Mr. Peter Richings. The benefit of this gentleman was a complete ovation, and a well-deserved compliment to his managerial abilities and the untiring zeal he has displayed in providing the music-loving public with the best dramatic novelties and performances that his individual exertions and the means at his command could afford. His daughter takes her benefit on Tuesday, the 1st of November, in response to an invitation signed by a number of influential San Franciscans. Limited space will not permit us to reiterate that praise which we have been enabled from time to time to truthfully and conscientiously bestow upon this talented young artiste in these columns. That we are not alone in our estimate of her abilities, the testimony of next Tuesday evening will prove.

Miss Jennie Kempton, contralto, takes her farewell benefit on Saturday evening, supported by Signor Bianchi and Miss Caroline Richings, who have volunteered their services for this occasion. Signor Bianchi will sing the celebrated aria "Ah, se ben mio," and with Miss Richings as "Leonora," and the beneficiary as "Azucena," undertake the role of "Manrico" in the prison scene in Il Trovatore and the opera of Maritana. Miss Kempton has already achieved a fine reputation for her artistic and tasteful style, the full and sympathetic qualities of her voice, her clear enunciation and excellent rendering of recitative. Considering that this lady made her operatic debut in San Francisco, and since her engagement with the troupe has studied and performed in nine English and three Italian operas, she deserves great credit for the progress she has made. We bespeak for her benefit a bumper.

On Friday evening the benefit of Mr. Hill was attended by a large audience, who were anxious to show their appreciation of the uniform industry, modest ambition and painstaking efforts of the tenor. Mr. Edward Seguin, baritone, takes his benefit on Monday, in Fra Diavola. The friends of this gentleman, who form a large class of the community, will see that a thorough artist and representative of a well-known musical family will not lack an appreciative audience.

At the Eureka, Manager Coes inaugurated the Saturday afternoon entertainments for ladies and families last week to a full house. Another will be given this afternoon at 2 o'clock. Little Jennie Worrell has been added to this company. Birch's new speech on the times, is an extremely witty and high flavored production, which is gaining some celebrity with the fun-lovers of the town. Good houses reward the good performances. Birch had a bountiful benefit some two weeks since, Backus another last week, and Abecco is to have one on Monday night. These plethoric gentlemen require frequent benefits to keep up to their present physical standard. Why don't the management give Simonsen one?

The American is running the Imperial Extravaganza of "Emperor Norton," a lively little affair full of fun, frolic, and local hits: with Walter Bray, J. W. Thomas, Joe Murphy, and Mrs. W. H. Leighton in the principal parts. Walter makes up capitally as The Emperor; and Mrs. Leighton as his long lost daughter supports him with refreshing vivacity.

The Museum with its innumerable attractions, Cosmoramic Views, etc., continues to draw a large portion of the wonder-seekers within its portals.

LADIES IN TAIL-COATS—PARIS FASHIONS.—The Duchess de Morny has been entertaining her friends at the intime—an intimate tea. Well, I wonder what it is? (says a Paris correspondent.) Of course, they had what Thackeray called the "domestic muffin;" but, then, I have a card for a "dancing tea." This, I presume will not be intimate. I must for an instant allude to a new fashion grounding my statement on a picture in the Journal Illustre. It was hinted some weeks ago that ladies were about to wear "tail-coats." The time has arrived for that innovation, and only the other night I beheld with astonishment, not unmixed with terror, many ladies in silk and satin dress-coats. Coats, waistcoats, shirts, collars and cravats—they have assumed them all in turns. What remains for them to wear? An echo answers—well, never mind what echo answers, but a Highland chieftain's wife would find it "ill" to assume ——. But who am I that I should interfere with ladies' toilets! Only I do hope that they won't get into the habit of standing with their backs to the fire-place and their hands in their pockets.

VALUE OF HEALTH.—Upwards of thirty years since, Dr. BENJAMIN BRANDRETH introduced to the community a vegetable pill which has since become the household medicine of tens of thousands of families in the United States, and throughout the countries of Europe and South America. When first brought to the notice of the public, few could be persuaded of its virtues. Gradually, at first, it was tried, and then, as case after case of recovery from many diseases reached the ears of the public, its value increased in what might be called geometrical proportions. Medical men, who had seen patients recover rapidly by the use of BRANDRETH'S pills who had for indefinite periods of time been under their charge without showing signs of improvement, began to despair, believing that the great secret of life and health had been discovered, and their occupation was gone from them. Some, more enterprising than their fellows, at once adopted into their practice the great conservator of health, and their success corresponded with their liberality. Since then, the Brandrethian system has been in the ascendant.

It is said that no habit has spread throughout the world so rapidly as the use of tobacco. This is a mistake. It has taken two hundred years to make the nicotine plant known to the nations, while in less than a quarter of a century the Brandreth Pill, as a purifier of the stomach and bowels, and as a preventive of every fever known, no matter by what term called or from what cause originated, has become the indispensable necessity of every people on the globe, civilized and barbarous.

It may be asked, why is this preparation so eminent over others? We answer, because, above every other, it does its work directly.

It cleanses the system thoroughly of every impurity, and restores the blood to its pristine condition. Dr. Brandreth holds, and his conclusions are based on physiological as well as Biblical fact, that all diseases originate in the blood, and that a medicine which seizes upon and purifies it, places the body that contains it beyond the possibility of abnormal action. It is not necessary to attempt to vindicate a theory so self-evident. We know that a fountain cannot send forth at the same time sweet water and bitter; and we also know that we cannot look for health where the fountain of health is corrupted. Purify the blood system, and life, strength, youth, and absence from disease are assured. These, the Brandreth Pill not only promises, but gives. Let those who would go through existence without sickness or even momentary pain, remember that the preventive from every ill lies in the vegetable preparation whose active and passive virtues no sane man will dispute, known as the Brandreth Medicine.

It is hardly necessary to state that Dr. B. continues his unremitting care in the manufacturing department of the Brandreth Pills; or that they are entirely free from chemical or mineral preparations; these facts being well known and understood to be so. While mercury and bleeding, and other deleterious remedies are becoming more and more unpopular, the Brandreth Pills are extending the sphere of their usefulness by the appreciation of a generous and discerning public.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute; and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electropathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathise with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required!

PROCLAMATION.

RESOLUTION No. 3,765.—RESOLVED, That notice of a GENERAL ELECTION for Presidential Electors and Representatives to the Congress of the United States, to be holden on the EIGHTH (8th) DAY OF NOVEMBER, A. D., 1864, be given by posting up at each place of holding election in said city and county, a copy of the Election Proclamation of his Excellency the Governor of the State of California, dated the 26th day of September, 1864, and by inserting the same in the Daily Alta California, a newspaper printed in said city and county, and such other newspapers as may insert the same without charge, for at least ten days before the said eighth day of November, A. D. 1864, which said Proclamation is in the following words and figures, to wit:

ELECTION PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, SACRAMENTO.

Notice is hereby given that a General Election will be held throughout the State of California, on TUESDAY, the EIGHTH DAY of NOVEMBER NEXT, when the following officers are to be elected:

Three Representatives to the Congress of the United States, to be elected in the following manner, viz.,

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Undersigned respectfully begs leave to inform the travelling public that he has assumed the entire charge of the above House, and had the same thoroughly renovated, and put in complete order. New furniture has been added, and he flatters himself that in point of cleanliness and comfort the House will compare favorably with any in the city.

Being conducted on the European plan the affords an extra inducement for travellers, and no pains or expense will be spared to make it as pleasant and popular a stopping place as can be found in the city, and at much lower rates than respectable accommodations can be found elsewhere.

The RAILROAD HOUSE COACH will convey passengers to the house, free of charge.

BEFORE VICKSBURG.

May 19, 1864.

WHILE Sherman stood beneath the hottest fire,
That from the lines of Vicksburg gleamed,
And bomb-shells tumbled in their smoky gyre,
And grape-shot hissed, and case-shot screamed;
Back from the front there came,
Weeping and sorely lame,
The merest child, the youngest face
Man ever saw in such a fearful place.

Stifling his tears, he limped his chief to meet;
But when he paused and tottering stood,
Around the circle of his little feet
There spread a pool of bright, young blood.
Shocked at his doleful case,
Sherman cried, "Halt! front face!
Who are you? Speak, my gallant boy!"
"A drummer, sir—Fifty-fifth Illinois."

"Are you not hit?" "That's nothing. Only send
Some cartridges: our men are out;
And the foe press us." "But, my little friend—"
"Don't mind me! Did you hear that shout?
What if our men be driven?
O, for the love of Heaven,
Send to my Colonel, General dear!"
"But you?" "O, I shall easily find the rear."

"I'll see to that," cried Sherman; and a drop,
Angels might envy, dimmed his eye,
As the boy, toiling towards the hill's hard top,
Turned round, and with his shrill child's cry
Shouted, "O, don't forget!
We'll win the battle yet!
But let our soldiers have some more,
More cartridges, sir—calibre fifty-four!"

[George K. Boker.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE'S LAST WORK.

VERY mournful, yet at the same time very beautiful, is this last production of the strange, profound, sensitive melancholy genius of Nathaniel Hawthorne—that true child of New England, half shadowed with Puritanism, half kindled with the light and glory of modern thought and feeling. It is mournful because it contains a picture, as true as it is sad, of the fading life, the slow petrifaction of an old man, long left behind by all his relatives excepting a little great-grand-daughter; because it is a fragment of what can now never be completed; and because it was composed at a time when the author's health was failing, and when the hand of Death was visibly upon him. The fragment is preceded by an account of Hawthorne's last moments, written, we are inclined to think, by Mr. Oliver Wendell Holmes—in itself, a beautiful piece of composition, and deeply interesting. The author, who seems to be possessed of medical knowledge, says he called on Hawthorne late in the afternoon of the day before he left Boston on his last journey. He found him weak and shrunken, and considered his aspect, from a medical point of view, very unfavorable. He was gentle, and willing to answer questions, but seemed to have no hope of recovering his health. Depressed as he was, however, his conversational powers were as fine as ever, though, as usual, he showed that nervous coyness which was one of the most remarkable features of his character, "so that talking with him was almost like lovemaking, and his shy, beautiful soul had to be wooed from its bashful prudency like an unschooled maiden." His friend gave him a few hints as to his health, and prescribed "a not ungrateful sedative and cordial or two;" and then they parted, never to meet again. We are told that, notwithstanding his bad symptoms, there was nothing which gave warning of so extremely sudden an end. "It seems probable that he died by the gentlest of all modes of release—fainting—without the trouble and confusion of coming back to life; a way of ending liable to happen in any disease attended with much debility." It was on the 19th of last May, in the town of Plymouth, New Hampshire, that Hawthorne expired; and on the 23d of the same month he was laid in the burial-ground of Concord, where he had long lived. His friend gives a touching description of the place and the occasion:

"The day of his burial will always live in the memory of all who shared in its solemn, grateful duties. All the fair sights and sweet sounds of the opening season mingled their enchantments as if in homage to the dead master, who, as a lover of Nature and a student of life, had given such wealth of poetry to our New England home, and invested the stern outlines of Puritan character with the colors of romance. It was the bridal day of the season, perfect in light as if Heaven were looking on, perfect in air as if Nature herself were sighing for our loss. The orchards were all in fresh flower—

> 'One boundless blush, one white-empurpled shower
> Of mingled blossoms;

the banks were literally blue with violets; the elms were putting out their tender leaves, just in that passing aspect which Raphael loved to pencil in the backgrounds of his holy pictures, not as yet printing deep shadows, but only mottling the sunshine at their feet. The birds were in full song; the pines were musical with the soft winds they sweetened. All was in faultless accord, and every heart was filled with the beauty that flooded the landscape."

The fragment now given to the world is so small a piece—such a mere stone from the edifice that would have been fairly wrought, had Time and Providence permitted,—that we can form no conception of what the story would have been. But the sketch is perfect in itself. It is a sketch of an old man and a young child, marvellous for outline, for coloring, and for profound mental insight. "Dr." Dolliver is an aged apothecary, living in some New England town in the pre-revolutionary times, as it would seem, and carrying about with him, to the wonderment and awe of the younger generations, personal memories of the far-away Witch times and the days of early Indian warfare with the settlers. He has had many descendants, but has outlived them all, save little Pansie, aged three years, who lives with him in a dull old house up a lane, with a prospect over the way of the churchyard where all their kinsfolk sleep. The subtle psychological analysis of the feeble old man's character as modified by the frost and mist of extreme age, is almost equalled by the singular pictorial power with which his personal appearance and his very clothes are brought before the reader's eye. In such descriptions as the following, externals themselves are made to expound the very recesses of the inner nature:

"He crammed a great silver watch into his fob, and drew on a patchwork morning-gown of ancient fashion. Its original material was said to have been the embroidered front of his own wedding waistcoat and the silken skirt of his wife's bridal attire, which his eldest grand-daughter had taken from the carved chest of drawers, after poor Bessie, the beloved of his youth, had been half a century in the grave. Throughout many of the intervening years, as the garment got ragged, the spinsters of the old man's family had quilted their duty and affection into it in the shape of patches upon patches, rose-color, crimson, blue, violet, and green, and then, (as their hopes faded, and their life kept growing shadier, and their attire took a sombre hue,) sober gray and great fragments of funereal black, until the Doctor could revive the memory of most things that had befallen him by looking at his patchwork gown, as it hung upon a chair. And now it was ragged again, and all the fingers that should have mended it were cold. It had an Eastern fragrance, too, a smell of drugs, strong-scented herbs and spicy gums, gathered from the many potent infusions that had from time to time been spilt over it; so that, snuffing him afar off, you might have taken Dr. Dolliver for a mummy, and could hardly have been undeceived by his shrunken and torpid aspect, as he crept nearer."

We must find room for one more extract—a long one—in which, with a mixture of truth and fancy which is almost ghastly in its strange suggestiveness, Hawthorne speaks of the ancient apothecary's inability to believe himself really old, even while freezing beneath the touch of the unwelcome fact:

"This weight of years had a perennial novelty for the poor sufferer. He never grew accustomed to it, but, long as he had now borne the fretful torpor of his waning life, and, patient as he seemed, he still retained an inward consciousness that these stiffened shoulders, these quailing knees, this cloudiness of sight and brain, this confused forgetfulness of men and affairs, were troublesome accidents that did not really belong to him. He possibly cherished a half-recognized idea that they might pass away. Youth, however eclipsed for a season, is undoubtedly the proper, permanent and genuine condition of man; and if we look closely into this dreary delusion of growing old, we shall find that it never absolutely succeeds in laying hold of our innermost convictions. A sombre garment, woven of life's unrealities, has muffled us from our true self, but within it smiles the young man whom we knew; the ashes of many perishable things have fallen upon our youthful fire, but beneath them lurk the seeds of inextinguishable flame. So powerful is this instinctive faith that men of simple modes of character are prone to antedate its consummation. And thus it happened with poor Grandsir Dolliver, who often awoke from an old man's fitful sleep with a sense that his senile predicament was but a dream of the past night; and hobbling hastily across the cold floor to the looking-glass, he would be grievously disappointed at beholding the white hair, the wrinkle and furrows, the ashen visage and bent form, the melancholy mask of Age, in which, as he now remembered, some strange and sad enchantment had involved him for years gone by!

"To other eyes than his own, however, the shrivelled old gentleman looked as if there were little hope of his throwing off this too artfully-wrought disguise, until, at no distant day, his stooping figure should be straightened out, his hoary locks be smoothed over his brows, and his much-enduring bones be laid safely away, with a green coverlet spread over them, beside his Bessie, who doubtless would recognize her youthful companion in spite of his ugly garniture of decay. He longed to be gazed at by the loving eyes now closed; he shrank from the hard stare of them that loved him not. Walking the streets seldom and reluctantly, he felt a dreary impulse to elude the people's observation, as if with a sense that he had gone irrevocably out of fashion, and broken his connecting links with the network of human life; or else it was that nightmare feeling which we sometimes have in dreams, when we seem to find ourselves wandering through a crowded avenue, with the noonday sun upon us, in some wild extravagance of dress or nudity. He was conscious of estrangement from his towns-people, but did not always know how nor wherefore, nor why he should be thus groping through the twilight mist in solitude. If they spoke loudly to him, with cheery voices, the greeting translated itself faintly and mournfully to his ears: if they shook him by the hand, it was as if a thick, insensible glove absorbed the kindly pressure and the warmth. When little Pansie was the companion of his walk, her childish gaiety and freedom did not avail to bring him into closer relationship with men, but seemed to follow him into that region of indefinable remoteness, that dismal Fairy-land of aged fancy into which Old Grandsir Dolliver had so strangely crept away."

We have here profound thought expressed in exquisitely translucent English. Alas, that the enchanter is removed from among us!—London Review.

WHOOPING-COUGH.—Mr. James Craig, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, adverting to the fact that 12,272 persons died from whooping-cough in 1862, states that during a recent visit he noticed in the most respectable Swedish journals a statement to the effect that whooping-cough can be cured by inhaling the air from the purifying apparatus in gas-works. One of these writers says: "This knowledge we have had from two to three months. I know a family where three children were cured by three visits to the purifying house. Our most distinguished physician for the diseases of children, Prof. Abelin, has found the remedy equally effective on a patient of his own family. I have seen a boy from three to four years of age be cured by six visits, the first three only lasting 10 to 15 minutes; the latter, on the contrary, 30 to 45 minutes." Mr. H. M. L. Backler, of London, confirms this statement, and adds that the practice of sending children to gas-works to inhale the gas from newly-opened purifiers has been adopted in France for two years past; and he says that, from information obtained at various works which he frequently visits, he infers that the cure for whooping-cough is perfect. "It often occurs that as many as a dozen children are brought to the gas-works at one time, and the managers have now come to regard this new custom as part of the daily routine of the business."

LOVE IN A DRAPER'S SHOP.—In an incident that has just occurred in Liverpool we have another evidence of how the powerful promptings of a "tender" heart control the more reflective senses of the mind. In a rather extensive business establishment in Liverpool, where there are several assistants engaged, there might have been seen, a week or two since, a young man of commanding deportment and of agreeable features, who gave effect to his avocation behind the counter in a manner that was at once inviting to the customers, and conducive to the success of his master. With many purchasers he became a favorite, but with one in particular. More than once—sometimes more than twice—in the course of a week, a carriage would be drawn up at the shop door, from which would emerge a lady, apparently between thirty and forty years of age—tall, of delicate appearance, but with an outline of features that unmistakably indicated an aristocratic descent. If the young gentleman—we say young, for he was scarcely twenty-one years of age—was not at his accustomed position behind the counter upon her entering the shop; she made the most urgent inquiries after him, desiring that he should attend to her and no one else. The worthy proprietor was always too happy to comply with her desire, for she was one of those first-rate customers that settled a good ledger account once in six months without the allowance of the ordinary discount. The favorite salesman was soon at his post serving the lady, and though a goodly number of articles might be disposed of, there appeared to exist a "peculiar something" in the "business transaction" which in the course of time looked very much like a warm cordiality of sentiment, and a reciprocity of feeling and idea bordering upon mutual attachment. Of course the young man was "chaffed" exceedingly by his envious shopmates, who were wont to ejaculate in their strange surmisings that it was a sort of proceeding "no fellah could understand." Since one day last week, however, the buxom stripling has become non est as far as the establishment is concerned, while the face of the lady as well, has not been presented within the visionary region of the other assistants or their employer. It is stated that a letter was addressed by the young man to his mother, on the eve prior to his leaving, stating that "he had left his old place to better himself elsewhere. Fortune had suddenly smiled upon him in a wondrous manner!" He assured his mother also that "the next time she confronted her 'darling boy,' she would see him a gentleman of the first stamp. He should then decline to say where he was gone, but he trusted she would not be nervous on that account, as she would hear from him again shortly." On inquiries being instituted, it was discovered that the lady too had been missing for several days from her home. No traces up to Thursday last—nearly a week having then elapsed—had been discovered of her whereabouts. She has been a widow for five years, and is without encumbrance. She has been residing in a rather picturesque village in Lancashire since her widowhood, and is in receipt of a liberal income. Under present circumstances we omit the names of the parties.—Liverpool Courier.

ANOTHER OF ARCHBISHOP WHATELY'S JOKES.—I find the following in Mr. Fitzgerald's Memoir: "Why does the operation of hanging kill a man?" inquired Dr. Whately. A physiologist replied, "Because inspiration is checked, circulation stopped, and blood suffuses and congests the brain." "Bosh!" replied his grace, "it is because the rope is not long enough to let his feet touch the ground." What I take to be the real story is recalled to me by this version. It was told to me some years ago by a retired member of the Irish bar, who was himself a witness to the archiepiscopal "sell." As Dr. Whately was dining in company with several of the judges, the conversation turned upon hanging. His grace was nettled at the extreme bumptiousness of one of the legal dignitaries, and asked him abruptly, "Why is a man hung?" The unconscious victim gave the historico-legal reply which befitted his position. "Bah!" interrupted his tormentor, "I'll tell you in these words—it's because the rope's so short." This sort of chaff is stupid enough, but the Archbishop would have his joke—if bad, well; if good, so much the better. There is one con-pun-drum of which I have heard him accused, which I have not seen in print. "Why is Essays and Reviews like a mill-pond?" "Because it has been dammed up." I have heard in Dublin that Dr. Whately kept in the yard of his house a large tree-block, on which he generally had half an hour's chopping for exercise in the morning. It is hard to say how much intellectual beheading that block saved the Archbishop's stupid friends.—Notes and Queries.

THE LATEST APPARITION OF THE MADONNA.—Miracles continue to multiply; the following is the latest reported: A farmer of the district of Piancastagnalo, near Florence, having openly declared that the cure of his arm from long-standing disease was attributable to the miraculous influence of the Madonna, who, he asserted, had appeared to him bodily on the window-panes of his own abode, the rumor of this "miracle" attracted crowds of devout worshippers to the spot. There, facing the small dwelling, with foreheads bared to the sun, the prostrate pilgrims did not fail to see the vision of the Madonna, with attendant saints and angels. The police thought to dispel attention by removing the panes from the windows, and substituting instead a couple of deal boards. But the visionaries saw the same sights and described the same personages even after the planks had been put up. The crowds keep still pouring in from all quarters.

TASSO creeping out of a pawnbroker's shop would make a very pretty picture of the vain glories of this life, and of emptiness of poetic glory. The auction-room often brings to light, in an old letter, or on the fly-leaf of an aged book, shreds of the true story, a finement of the face without paint, or a bit of the time-honored plate, lacking its former showy gilt. What a little lesson does this scrap from Paris teach us: "A curious autograph of Tasso was sold to-day, which gives an insight into the poet's early struggles: 'I, the undersigned, acknowledge to have received from Abraham Levy, 25 livres, for which sum I have pledged a sword of my father's, six shirts, and two silver spoons.'" The document bears the date of March 2, 1570, at which time Tasso was twenty-six.

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Bello.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29-3m

CLOUDS.

A friend had I,
Whose pure, deep love I thought could never die;
Our lives seemed blent
As a duet upon an instrument—
My faint touch finishing
The passionate tremolo of the master's string.

But one sad day
A shadow, like a great mist, 'twixt us lay,
As now between
Two hills I see great fog-clouds intervene;
Yet, where I stand,
The hill is sunny and the air is bland,
And just in sight
Above the mists, are green peaks clothed in light.

This spectral cloud
Hides a great city with its snowy shroud;
And yet I know
Where, by the fog-hid cot, the fuchsias grow,—
I know the hearth
Where children gambol in their heedless mirth,
I know the street
Where idlers stroll, and men of business meet.

And so I think
There is no real severance of this link;
Hid by the dark,
In that warm heart still glows the friendly spark;
And when at last
This mystic cloud rolls backward to the past,
We both shall see
What was deemed falsehood was obscurity.

Emilie Lawson.

ON A PRETTY GIRL AT THE OPERA.

Being at the Opera the other night, I chanced to be seated near an exceedingly pretty girl. For various reasons, I shall not attempt to describe her here. I might as well try to convey the effect of that particular passage of Donizetti which seemed an accompaniment of her loveliness, by introducing the musical score at this point, as to describe the bright beauty of her face in those formal epithets and somewhat serious and decorous sentences which my thoughts are apt to assume in the process of composition. Had I the glowing pen of a Cobb, a Braddon, or a Southworth, or could I borrow for a moment the graceful style of that ingenious young person who writes the love stories for Harpers' Magazine, I think I could fire each masculine bosom with an inventory of her charms. I say masculine, as women do not always sympathize with our delineation of their sex's loveliness, and are apt when we allude to flowing ringlets or a beautiful complexion, to question the genuineness of the one and the ownership of the other. I leave the task to more competent hands. Even as Falstaff spoiled his voice by the too early "singing of anthems," so perhaps I have been unduly impressed in my youth by those short-hand axioms which were the text of my copy-book, and aught not only the outline and letter, but much of the formal seriousness of the original. Perhaps the young beauty detected traces of this quality of mind in my lugubrious visage and the sad civility of my demeanor, for she allowed her lorgnette to rest upon me with a frank and fearless simplicity which a few years ago I might have foolishly misinterpreted. Ah me! I knew only too well why she did so, now, and why she slyly glanced but once at the brisk young fellows who lined the walls, and pensively sucked the handles of their canes. She saw that I was harmless. Her quick feminine instincts told her that I had already fallen in the toils of her strategic sex—perhaps something about my hair betokened the frequent presence of infant fingers, and even the careless movement of my right foot thrown over my left leg betrayed the habit of figurative journeys to Banbury Cross in quest of that apochryphal old horsewoman. O my brother Benedicks, we may assume the youthfulness and habiliments of twenty one, we may jest and wear our chains with a wild and hysterical freedom, somewhere about us we carry the private mark of the one woman who controls our destinies—a mark invisible to ourselves, but one by which the rest of her sex know and weigh us. We detect it not in others—tho knowledge is peculiar to them—a terrible free-masonry which obtains among these guileless creatures to an extent which I sometimes shudder to think of. And yet—and it is another reason why my fair young friend dropped that mask of coquetry which is woman's natural weapon of defense—she knew that by virtue of my very condition I held her at a disadvantage. I knew how much artifice went to make up the ensemble of that charming figure. I knew the disenchanting processes which ended in such an enchanting result. I had peeped into the veiled mysteries which surround the feminine toilette, and knew—

But the music changed, and my thoughts, changing with it as the curtain rose, spared me the unmanly disclosure. How pretty she looked as she leaned slightly forward, her white cloak dropping from her bare little shoulder as the mists might have slipped down Mount Ida and disclosed the sacred summits to the dazzled shepherd. Then it was that Capricornicus, father of half a dozen grown-up daughters, leaned forward too, and applied his opera-glass to eyes whose wickedness even that fashionable media could not make respectable. Then it was that, seeking to escape his scrutiny, she raised her glass to the opposite wall where seventeen young gentlemen, spleudidly attired, and having a general atmosphere of kid gloves about them, were decently ranged. Poor girl! Instantly seventeen opera-glasses were levelled, and seventeen hands went up to an equal number of neck-ties to arrange them as she gazed. There was one exception. One young man modestly dropped his eyes and affected deep concern, just then, with the business of the stage, while a deep flush mounted his cheeks. He was evidently thinking of the girl, while the others were thinking of themselves. However, she did not seem to notice it, and the sincerer compliment, as usual, passed unheeded. Her mission that evening was to be observed—not to observe. The object of her existence was fulfilled in looking pretty.

Perhaps there is no gift of nature that requires as little exertion on the part of the owner as personal beauty. I am not certain but that it is this very absence of effort which excites our admiration; for it is one of the cruel paradoxes of life that the very attempt to please often militates against the desired result. A few yards from my fair friend sat a plainer young girl, who by amiability of manner was evidently seeking to impress the gentleman at her side; on the next beneh an intelligent-looking little brunette was as evidently exerting her talents of conversation to the same end. Yet there sat my pretty girl, unconsciously absorbing even the wandering attention of those gallants; there she was, enchanting, bewitching—what you will—with no exertion on her part, nay, without even tickling the masculine vanity by giving them the least reason to suppose that any scintillation of her dark eyes was induced by them. Still more: there was an artful suggestion of the very qualities which belonged to her neighbors in her beauty. There was amiability nestling in the curves of her dimpled cheeks, brightness and intelligence in the quick turn of her eye, love in its liquid depths, piety in its upward glance, modesty in the downward sweep of its maiden fringes. Yet if her performance of these virtues kept well in the rear of her promises, who was to blame? A burst from the orchestra obviated any answer to that last question, and I turned toward the stage.

I have forgotten the exact plot of the opera; suffice it that it was the old duet of Love and Youth; the pleasing fiction which we always accept that genuine passion finds its best interpreter in the tenor and soprano voices; that all vice is of a baritone quality; that disappointed love or jealousy seeks an exponent in the contralto: and that whatever may be our trials, we have a number of sympathizing friends always handy in the chorus. As the handsome tenor, glittering with gold-lace, velvet and spangles, gallantly leads the black-eyed soprano, equally resplendant and unreal, in satin and jewels, down to the footlights, and pours forth his simulated passion in most unnatural yet romantic song, I cannot help a slight stirring at my breast and turn toward my beauty as if she were in some way a part of the performance. I can't help thinking how pleasant it would be were I a few years younger, and she would permit me to ramble with her, hand in hand, under the canvas trees beside the pasteboard rocks; to sit at her feet as she reclined on the bank at the R. U. E., and so tell her of my passion in B natural. I would promise, and we should mutually agree, that our engagement should not go beyond the clasping of hands, amidst the voices of a joyful chorus, as the curtain descends before the winking footlights. I have my doubts about the romance extending further. In the absence of any opera which goes beyond the simple act of espousal, I should hesitate. I have sometimes been tormented with vague surmises as to what became of the heroines I have so often seen happily disposed of at the fall of the curtain. I fear that within a month after the marriage of the Daughter of the Regiment, Tonio addressed his wife somewhat after this fashion: "Now, my dear, considering your aunt's prejudices and the circles in which we move, you really must try to get over that infernal barrack-room slang;" or sarcastically, "Oh! I suppose that was when you were in the army;" or vindictively, when Sulpice came to see her, "D—me, madam, if a regiment of father's-in-law ain't drawing it a little too heavy." I have no doubt that Amina often had that circumstance of being found in the Count's bed-room, thrown in her face by her credulous spouse, and if Miss Linda of Chamounix succeeded in explaining the circumstances of that little Parisian episode in her life, satisfactorily to her husband, it's more than she has done to me.

I would not have the thoughtless reader suppose that this terrible picture of matrimonial experience is at all biased Can any one doubt from Madelaine's character that she did not lead the poor Postillion of Lonjumeau a devil of a life after she finally captured him? or that she did not occasionally make him feel who had the money, and talk hypocritically of her dear deceased aunt in the Isle of France, when he had a fellow-actor down to dinner. I fear, too, that there is no musical accompaniment which can lend an air of romance to the bringing-up of a small family, and that Mozart himself couldn't invest whooping-cough with harmony, or express croup, even with the aid of a bassoon, in a manner that would be entertaining. And the more that I look at my young beauty as she laughs and chats away at her companion, I fear that I should not choose her for any of the emergencies I have just suggested, were I one of those who are standing against the wall, pensively sneking their canes. Why I should not, is a question that as I am about to answer the curtain falls, and with the sudden extinguishing of the bright but unreal world beyond, as if she were a part of it, rises my beauty, draws her cloak about her polished shoulders, and mixing with the crowd passes away from these pages forever.

Bret.

The "Loo" Family.—Judge Griffith, on the bench in B——, appointed a crier whose want of sense was more than made up by the size of his voice. A young lawyer at the bar, with more fun than legal lore in him, was fond of playing off jokes upon him. So one day the judge ordered the crier to call Jabez Logue. The lawyer, stepping behind the crier, whispered "Epi-logue" in his ear, "Epilogue!" shouted the crier. "Mono-logue" said the lawyer. "Monologue!" cried the crier. "Pro-logue," and the crier still cried "Pro-logue!" "Dia-logue," and the pertinacious crier shouted "Dia-logue!" at the top of his voice. Discouraged at hearing no response from the Logue family, the crier turned and said to the Court, sitting in mute astonishment at the stupid crier's calls: "I've called all the logs in town, and never one of them is here to speak for himself."

INCIDENTS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

NUMBER TWO.

PRECIPITATE WRED HAS ANOTHER MIDNIGHT ADVENTURE WITH THE GUERRILLAS.

THE hearty cheers which followed the announcement that Precipitate Wred was promoted to be a corporal for his part in the affair of the previous day, awakened in the breast of the "bold soldier boy" a sentiment of genuine brotherly feeling for the whole corps. He protested most earnestly, however, that he did not think any act of his worthy of the high compliment, but pledged himself to repay them in the future for the momentary thrill of pleasure they had bestowed upon him.

"Boys, I have spotted about twenty of them greasers," said the corporal, as the company gathered round him after roll-call, "and if you'll only back me up, I'll bet a horse we corral the whole gang before a week. The orderly-sergeant has allowed me to detail a dozen of you for special service, and if we don't beat the bushes till game enough is scared up for all hands, my name's not Precipitate Wred!"

"I'll stake a month's pay that the corporal wins a commission before he is six months in service," said an enthusiastic member, who was anxious to form one of the squad.

"Now, Dick," said Wred, coaxingly, "if you're a friend of mine, let up on that kind of talk; for I pledge my word I've no other ambition than to get up a good name for the company. You know that I have no idea of adopting this business as a profession. We all came out here on a lark together, and I hope all that are left of us when the war is over, will enjoy the fruits equally. Let's all pull together, boys, and give the honors to Captain Jack."

The corporal now proceeded to call out his squad, and the clamorous confusion of the company testified their eagerness to participate in something which promised active service. Wred had first-rate material to select from—intelligent, quick, enthusiastic young men, who had volunteered "for the fun of the thing;" and though actuated perhaps by motives similar to those which would influence an "old sport" to join a bear hunt, there was not one of them but would sooner leave his bones in Mexico than have his own name attainted with dishonor, or his company's with disgrace. Several of his party were young Creoles of Louisiana, who spoke French and Spanish with as much fluency as English; an old salt, who had "mated" all over the world in all manner of craft; an ex-policeman, who had at his fingers' ends all the devices of that cunning fraternity; a disciple of Thespis, who had "in his time played many parts," and generally played them well; a typo, rejoicing in the soubriquet of "Johnny Pi;" and half a dozen of the most reckless dare-devils that had ever "steamboated" on the Mississippi river.

Early next morning the squad saddled-up, and Precipitate repaired to Capt. D.'s marquee to report himself ready for duty. The "old man" complimented Wred on the selection of men he had made, and wrote a very flattering letter of introduction to the commanding officer at Vera Cruz. Cautioning the corporal not to "throw away his trumps," he reached under his cot for a demijohn of old cognac and a box of Havanas, and told "Precip." to invite his men over to get an eye-opener. They obeyed the summons cheerfully—drank to the captain's health, and attentively listened to a discourse on the importance of strict discipline. The party now lit their cigars, mounted their impatient steeds, and galloped over the smooth beach toward the gates of Vera Cruz—each one silently indulging his own speculations as to the result of the expedition.

Arrived at headquarters, Wred reported himself to the commanding officer, who searchingly scrutinized the corporal, questioned him closely about the affair with the guerrillas, the character of the men he had with him to discover their haunts, and wound up by saying, approvingly, "You'll do." Giving the corporal a carte blanche for each individual of his squad, he told him to quarter them wherever he saw proper, procure whatever disguises might be required, and draw upon the Quartermaster for any sum necessary to carry out his work.

While crossing the Plaza with one of his comrades shortly after, their attention was arrested by a poor wretch staggering under a load of charcoal, sufficient, almost, to load a wagon. Accosting the man in a friendly manner, they asked, "How far have you packed that load?"

"Two leagues, worthy masters," replied the man, with an air of extreme humility.

"And what do you receive for it?"

"Four reales, señores."

"How many loads do you make and sell in a week?"

"Five loads a month, only, good friends—one of which is paid the municipality for the privilege of selling it," replied the disconsolate-looking charcoal merchant.

"Why the devil don't you turn robber?" asked Wred's companion.

The man smiled at the suggestion as if it were not altogether objectionable, and resumed his way. But Wred was not satisfied entirely with the interview. He thought he detected something in the man's countenance that betokened more intelligence than usually falls to men of his class, and determined to keep on the fellow's track. Retracing their steps they followed [illegible] until he entered the court-yard of a large hotel, where they lost sight of him among the crowd of servants that thronged the lower part of the building. Half an hour afterwards, sauntering leisurely into the saloon up-stairs, they discovered their quondam charcoal-burner dressed in fine white linen, smoking a cigarito, and evidently a man of authority about the establishment; and what was of greater importance, Precipitate recognized in him one of the band of guerrillas who had kept him "closeted" a couple of nights previous.

The corporal immediately sought his comrades and communicated his "point" to them. In an hour the three young creoles were registered as guests of the house representing themselves as clerks of a mercantile house in Havana, who were awaiting an opportunity to reach the City of Mexico on important commercial business. They could manage to go unmolested by the Yankees, and were exceedingly anxious to have a passport from Padre Jarauta, the chief of the guerrillas in that Department, for which they were able and willing to pay handsomely. Of course, the landlord could "know nothing" of the guerrillas, himself, but he would endeavor to do all in his power for his liberal guests, introducing them to a number of visitors to his house. The "visitors" aforesaid were duly "spotted" and their domiciles noted when they left the house by the remainder of the squad who were on hand to carry out every point of the game under the supervision of the ex-policeman. In the course of the day the "clerks" managed to learn that a company of guerrillas intended to surprise that night the hacienda of Don Estevan Sucor, about four leagues south-west of Vera Cruz. It appeared the old Don had shown some favors to the Americans, and that fact was to be the pretext for putting him under heavy contribution.

Wred communicated this information to the commanding officer, who told him to get his men together and proceed at once to Don Estevan's under the guidance of a native boy whom he would send with the party; and also despatched a messenger with another guide to Capt. D. with orders to proceed with his company to a point on the national road where it communicated with the Orizaba road by a trail, and use all diligence to meet the corporal by midnight at Estevan's hacienda.

By sundown, Wred's party were in the saddle and armed with a six-shooter in each holster and one in the belt, besides their carbines and sabres. The thirteen men had 247 shots, and considered themselves equal to a regiment of mustang-mounted guerrillas. Dividing in couples, they made their exit from the city by different gates and rendezvoused about a mile below the town on the sea-beach, just as the moon emerged from the misty horizon of the gulf. Pursuing their way along the beach a few miles, the guide suddenly dismounted in front of a brush-heap of dead branches that looked as if they might have drifted up against the edge of the closely-interlaced chaparral. Pulling them aside, a narrow opening was discovered, barely sufficient to allow horsemen in single file to enter it. A distance of two hundred yards, however, brought the party into a wider avenue, ingeniously cut by the guerrillas for purposes of their own, through the dense forest of mezquit, and trending a serpentine course to avoid discovery from the surrounding promontories. As the party silently jogged along this narrow defile they would occasionally get a glimpse of the moon, but for miles of the way the blackness of night shrouded every object in almost impenetrable darkness. After a while a sound resembling the cry of a turtle-dove broke through the stillness of the night, seemingly but a short distance ahead of the party, and the guide, frightened out of his wits, suddenly rushed back to the centre of the squad, exclaiming: "It is the night signal of the guerrillas!"

"Silence! or I'll blow the top of your head off," muttered Wred. "How much farther is it to the hacienda?"

"Half a league, señor," was the trembling reply of the guide.

"And how far is it to the open country?"

"Only a short distance; that signal, I think, was on the edge of the clearing."

"Boys," said the corporal, addressing his comrades, "we must remain in this defile until near midnight, and then gallop to the hacienda, where we will meet the Captain with the balance of our company. Meantime, muffle your sabres and make as little noise as possible while we approach the edge of the clearing."

Slowly and silently the party proceeded towards the opening, and by the moon's rays they found it was yet two hours till midnight. Presently the sound of a straggling fire of escopetas was heard in the direction of the hacienda. Precipitate asked his men if they were willing to risk an attack on the guerrillas without the co-operation of the company; before the time set for their arrival the place would probably be plundered, while a bold charge and an "Arkansas yell" would more than likely demoralize the thieving rascals. The men responded with a unanimous "ay!" and in an instant the party were off on a gallop. They had not proceeded far before they met a man on horseback, with a female behind him. They did not perceive Wred's party until close upon them, and were so delighted at the discovery of friendly Americans that for a few moments they were unable to speak. They presently stated, however, that a company of guerrillas had rushed in upon a party of ladies and gentlemen who had assembled at the hacienda for a fandango, and had taken possession of the house, fired upon some of the party, and would probably murder them all unless assistance arrived.

"How many do they muster?" inquired Wred.

"About one hundred—but they are poorly mounted on mustangs and mules, and are not all armed," was the reply.

The corporal now directed his men to approach the place on a "ranger charge," fire a volley from their carbines, wheel, and fall back to the shade at the edge of the thicket. This movement startled the guerrillas, who little expected an attack, and, unable to discern the number of their assailants, were panic-stricken. The shout of "los Yanquis! los Yanquis!" mingled with the screams of the women in the house, awoke the echoes of the surrounding forest. The leader of the guerrillas dashed here and there, brandishing his sabre in the moonbeams, and screaming at the top of his voice for his men to rally. Some thirty or forty of them were soon collected in a "bunch," without order, and evidently in doubt whether to sink into the ground or fly into the air. Wred's party lost no time, but swooped down upon the foe with a most demoniac yell. Strong horses and the determined courage of brave men were too much for the cowardly villains, and they broke and ran in the wildest confusion. Wred and his party pursued them to the edge of the chaparral, and then returned towards the house.

When he arrived there, the remnant of the guerrillas had fled. Don Estevan Sucor, a dignified old gentleman, met the party at his door and returned thanks in most extravagant terms. The corporal with three or four of the men dismounted and entered the house, where some half-a-dozen ladies and as many badly-frightened caballeros were huddled up in a corner as if awaiting a bloody termination to their deliverance from the guerrillas. The corporal's jolly red face and good nature soon assured them, however, that his party were really their friends. The ladies now implored the dragoons to remain at the hacienda till morning, and protect them from another raid of their rascally countrymen, and promised a feast of the best the place afforded. Precipitate agreed, after he should have scoured the neighborhood and posted vedettes at the avenues of approach, to return with the remainder and spend the night. This was soon accomplished, with the aid of Don Estavan, and the party returned, leaving three of their number, concealed at different points.

In the meantime, the servants of the place were enacting a bloody tragedy in the fowl-yard: turkeys and chickens were immolated and hen-roosts robbed to prepare a feast for their rescuers and the remainder of the company, whose arrival was expected at midnight. In the parlors the ladies had arranged for a dance. The dragoons appreciated the hospitality of their host, and conducted themselves as gentlemen. The corporal, who, from force of habit, "paid his addresses to the landlady," made himself quite a favorite with the elderly Donna Sucor, who fancied she discerned a likeness in him to her great-grandfather, the Marquis de Colorado, a Spanish grandee of some centuries back.

* * * * *

As daylight approached, and the captain not yet arriving, Precipitate thought he would scout in the direction the enemy had fled during the night, and endeavor to find the captain, who had probably lost his way in the labyrinths of the chaparral. Relieving two of the vedettes, his party approached the spot where, two hours before, they had stationed one of the young Creoles, in a secluded nook on the brow of a hillock which overlooked the country round for several miles. To their surprise and horror, they discovered his horse had gone, and a few yards distant lay the poor fellow weltering in his blood. His shirt was pulled open, and from a horrid gash in his left breast a bloody stream oozed forth and formed a sickening pool beside him. His eyes upturned were filmed with the glare of death. Wred took hold of his clenched hand and said:

"Tell, me, Adolph, good fellow, who did this?"

"Mother, mother, dear mother—oh, send the relief!" feebly ejaculated the dying vedette.

"The relief has come, Adolph—my boy—my dear friend," said Precip., but his emotions choked his utterance.

"Yes," said one of the party, "his relief has come—the relief that all of us, sooner or later, may look for."

He was dead. . . . His comrades carried the bleeding corpse to the hacienda, lately the scene of so much pleasure, but now overcast in gloom by this tragic circumstance. Only a few hours before Adolph Duvilier had made himself conspicuous in the assemblage by his gentlemanly bearing, and lively conversation. Born of an excellent family, he had been accustomed to good society, and left a brother, and a beautiful and accomplished sister at home, who would be heart broken at this disaster. . . . .

Don Estevan offered to have him buried in his family vault, but his comrades insisted, as he had fallen at his post while on duty, to give him a soldier's burial, with nothing around him but his uniform. The earth soon covered his remains and the party fired a salute over his grave. The good host and the ladies and servants of the household attended the ceremonies, and were much affected, promising to erect a monument to his memory.

Before the party resumed their march, the ex-typo, "Johnny Pi," who was usually the embodiment of fun, but who now wore a look of determination, approached and said, "Corporal Wred, here is a lock of Adolph's hair; send it with an account of his death to his sister, Estelle Duvilier—I will furnish you with her address."

"No, no, Johnny," said the corporal; "do you perform that duty. I have not the heart to relate this sad story."

"I have another duty to perform," continued Johnny; 'before I eat a week's rations I will send to his brother the heart of a guerrilla in a glass bottle!"

"And I," said another, "swear by ——, to make the first 'greaser' I meet swallow my sabre!"

"And I, too, subscribe to that oath!" repeated one after another of the men, who were giving way to their very worst passions.

"Hold, boys!" said Wred, "I have a proposition to make. If the landlord of our hotel in Vera Cruz don't put us in the way of capturing Duvilier's sneaking assassin within a week, we'll hang him from his own window! What do yo say?"

"Agreed!—agreed," responded the party.

"With the understanding that Johnny shall send his glass-bottle present to Adolph's brother," said one.

"May I be d—d if I don't do it!" said the determined typographer.

The squad now resumed their march in quest of the captain, but the adventure which soon befel them would occupy too much space to be included in this sketch.

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S
Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

PASSING BY HELICON.

MY steps are turned away,
Yet my eyes linger still
On their beloved hill,
In one long last survey;
Gazing, through tears that multiply the view,
Their passionate adieu.

O joy-enclouded height,
Down whose enchanted sides
The rosy mist now glides,
How can I lose thy sight?
How can my eyes turn where my feet must go,
Trailing their way in woe!

Gone is my strength of heart;
The roses that I brought
From thy dear bowers, and thought
To keep, since we must part—
Thy thornless roses, sweeter until now
Than round Hymettus' brow,

The golden-vested bees
Find sweetest sweetness in;
Such odors dwelt within
The moist red hearts of these—
Alas! no longer give out blissful breath,
But odors rank with death.

Their dewiness is dank;
It chills my pallid arms,
Once rosy 'neath their charms;
And their green stems hang lank,
Smitten with leprosy and fair no more,
But withered to the core.

Vain thought! to bear along
Into this torrid track,
Whence no one turneth back,
With his first wanderer's song
Yet on his lips, thy odors and thy dews
To deck these dwarfed yews.

No more within thy vales,
Beside thy plashing wells,
Where sweet Euterpe dwells,
With songs of nightingales,
And sounds of flutes that make pale silence glow,
Shall I thy rapture know.

Farewell, ye stately palms!
Clashing your cymbal tones
In through the mystic moans
Of pines at solemn psalms;
Ye myrtles, singing Love's inspired song,
We part, and part for long!

Farewell, majestic peaks!
Whereon my list'ning soul
Hath trembled to the roll
Of thunders which Jove wreaks,
And calm Minerva's oracles hath heard
All more than now unstirred!

Adieu, ye beds of bloom!
No more shall zephyr bring
To me, upon his wing,
Your loveliest perfume;
No more upon your pure immortal dyes
Shall rest my happy eyes.

I pass by: at thy foot,
O mount of dear delight!
Ere yet from out thy sight
I drop my voiceless lute;
It is in vain to strive to carry hence
Its olden eloquence.

Your sacred groves no more
My singing shall prolong
With echoes of my song,
Doubling it o'er and o'er:
Haunt of the Muses, lost to wistful eyes,
What dreams of thee shall rise!

Rise but to be dispelled;
Here, where my lot is cast,
Such visions may not last,
By sterner fancies quelled;
Relentless Nemesis this doom hath sent—
My cruel banishment!

F. F. VICTOR.

SIGNS THAT FAILED.—We all remember the story of the Inn-keeper who became proud as he prospered, and, taking down his sign of the Ass, put up a portrait of George IV. in its place. His neighbor immediately raised the east-off effigy, and "in this sign he conquered." The first landlord, alarmed at the increasing popularity of his rival, and understanding the cause, wrote underneath the grim visage of his Majesty: "THIS IS THE REAL ASS."

But a more ludierous incident of the kind is just now told at the expense of the good Bishop of Llandaff. He took up his abode near the head of Lake Windermere, where the principal inn had been known as the Cock; but the landlord, by way of compliment to his distinguished neighbor, substituted the Bishop as the new sign. An inn-keeper close by, who had frequently envied mine host of the Cock for his good fortune in securing a considerable preponderance of visitors, took advantage of the change, and attracted many travellers to his house by putting up the sign of the Cock. The landlord with the new sign was much discomfited at seeing many of his old customers deposited at his rival's establishment; so, by way of remedy, he put up, in large, red letters, under the portrait of the bishop: "THIS IS THE OLD COCK."

FELINE INCUB-US.—"Pa," said a four-year old of the feminine persuasion, the other morning at breakfast; "pa, do you like them eggs?" "Yes, dear, very much," replied the doting parent. "Well, pa, 'twas my Pussy made them. I found her polishing them in the chicken's nest yesterday." The anxious father doesn't like eggs "very much" since then.

CONVICTED OF SIN.

AN ANCIENT LEGEND.

BY FLORENCE JAMES.

ONCE, in olden times, there was a rich monastery situated in a fertile and luxurious land, but distant from any large city, or from the court of any of the petty princes, who, at that time, ruled the country to its destruction. It stood alone, in the midst of its own vast domains. They surrounded it on every side—a glorious expanse, decked as never yet was monarch, with the beauty and bounty of Nature. The fertile soil, the temperate but genial sky, the pure and healthy atmosphere, seemed contrived only for man's enjoyment, and lay before his eye a most convincing page of evidence to the goodness and mercy of God. Yet neither all this beauty, nor the remoteness of their habitations from the haunts of men, where most the rankness of human nature is supposed to thrive, had preserved the monks of this convent from the infection of voluptuousness and vice which pervaded all classes in that age. On the contrary, it had rather induced them to add extraordinary oppression and arrogance to the usual list of ecclesiastical works; for there were none near their possessions of sufficient strength to threaten them with retributive justice, or keep them in awe of superior force. The peasants, who tilled their lands, filled their granaries, and trod their wine, knew nothing of the mighty power of combination. Each one toiled on at his appointed task, content if the grip of tyranny, which seized his neighbor, spared himself, and, investing his taskmaster with the power of God, felt all his pains rewarded when he heard that his sins were forgiven him. So they flocked to the convent as their fathers had done before them; they filled its coffers with wealth; they strengthened its hands with power, and the monks said, "Give, give!"

Late one lowering evening, there came to the great gate which, wide open, seemed ever to invite the weary to rest and the heavy laden to forego their burden, a traveling brother of the order—a dark, sad man, who, wayworn and foot-sore, sought among them rest for the coming Sabbath and shelter from the bursting storm which for some time had muttered in the distance, as if struggling wrathfully with the mountain rampart that so often kept it from the convent valley. This time the mountains were no match for the demons of the storm. Mass after mass of the dark clouds poured through the ravines, clambered over the highest peaks, and, covering the cheerful prospect with the gloom of sudden night, swept unopposed down the hill-side. The mountain pines bent with a surging sound as the darkness enveloped them, and, in the valley, a strange chilliness, an unnatural hush came tainting the sunshine with sadness, even in advance of the storm itself. The tired traveller was but just in time to save his thin garments from the soaking rain which in a few minutes drenched the court-yard and pleasant garden, driving in the monks who were taking their easy exercise in the cool evening air. They flocked in now from every nook and corner, pleasant garden, quiet cloister, comfortable cell—some shaking the heavy drops of rain from their robes, some rubbing the afternoon nap from their eyes, all vieing with one another in a cordial greeting to the pilgrim, who had given his name as Brother Paul. Situated far from any of the great high roads, their life in the valley, where they alone were masters, though easy, was monotonous. It was seldom they were enlivened by visitors, and when one chanced to come along that way, they enjoyed with something of excitement the pleasure of a new companion, new jests, new anecdotes around their well-spread board, to while away the long evening hours, hearing once again the echo of that busy, striving life, beyond their own sleepy domains, which they had left forever, but for which they still hankered, as the Israelites for the flesh-pots of Egypt. The first glance at the stranger's stern brow and furrowed face showed that, whatever else the wandering monk had seen, mirth and he had not met for many a year. There was even more of awe than of disappointment in the feeling with which they regarded their guest, as each in turn experienced the chilling influence of the cold dark eye, that looked as though it read the secret of each soul as easily as a written book, even while it scarcely designed to look upon it. The evening prayer and the evening meal passed almost in silence. News Brother Paul had none to give, and jest and laughter seemed to fly from wherever he might be. Never had there been known such a guest at the convent before. The repelled and astonished monks sat about in silent groups; and, save when some one bolder than the rest addressed a faint attempt at conversation to their strange guest, or the Superior, mindful of the credit of his convent and puzzled what manner of man he might have to deal with, announced some fine precept, or touched cautiously upon some vexed question of the schools, there was little talk among them that dreary evening. The silent brother within, and the storm without, had it all their own way. The wild winds raged over the hill-sides and down the gorges of the valleys as if the armies of evil had been let loose to ride them; strong forest trees, that had stood through many a storm, fell with a crash that night; tower and buttress and belfry echoed the groans of the furious elements, and the melancholy groups within began to fear for their safety, as they listened to the thunder that burst from the rent heavens at the same instant with the lightning, telling plainly how close above their heads the danger was. Never before had the oldest then passed such a night, and beads were told, and prayers were said, with more devotion, than many among them could remember to have felt for long years. The only one that was quite unmoved amid the din that seemed to make the very mountains tremble was the stranger, who sat among them stern and self-absorbed, as if he had that within him he heard and felt above the storm.

The morning broke, cloudy and dark; but the strength of the storm was past, and though the wind still sobbed and moaned among the mountains and blew wildly across the valley, the silvery-gray rifts of the clouds that chased one another in mad haste over the sky promised sunshine and light after the storm, and cast gleams of glory over the fair landscape as they passed.

Earliest at the early prayers was Brother Paul. The daylight only showed more clearly the terrible look on his face—a look as if he were continually enduring an anguish so fearful that only the greatest effort of a powerful will restrained the groans that were ready to break from his lips; and yet, too, whatever it was he suffered must surely have been borne for years, to have traced those deep lines upon his cheek. In accordance with the long-established custom of the convent, the Superior requested the visitor to preach the sermon at the principal service of the day: and Brother Paul signified that he was willing and prepared to do so. When the time came the chapel was crowded, not only with the monks and lay-brothers of the establishment, but with the tenants and peasantry of the large estates attached to it. Their attendance was strict and regular; their demeanor devout. They knew that profound deference for the Church secured from their ecclesiastical masters many a petty privilege which eased their life of toil. When the holy ceremonies were over, and the last echoes of the voices had died away in the vaulted roof, Brother Paul took his place in the pulpit and began his address. At the first sound of those mellow tones, the drowsiest ear awoke to listen to a music such as they had never known before. Scarcely had he spoken three sentences before every one of the congregation was gazing at the wan, gloomy face above them, and listening to catch each word of that sonorous, untranquil voice. Those who heard him have said they could never justly describe the magic eloquence which came convincing, and, for the time, converting, from his lips.

He told them first that he had nothing new to say, nothing but what they had heard every week of their lives, till many of them in their hearts were tired of it—the same oft-told tale of man's sins, and their inevitable consequences; but he was there to speak it; they could choose whether they would listen or not. Briefly but powerfully he spoke of the great happiness of a virtuous life and pure heart, and then of the exceeding great reward of the redeemed in heaven, with such impressive clearness that it seemed as if he made the narrow minds of his auditors expand to comprehend the ineffable, and something of the blissful peace which passeth all understandings, brooded for a moment on their hearts. For a moment only, for he changed the theme. Sternly he admonished them of their vices, plucking each favorite sin from its concealment—its false semblance of a virtue—the living to the world the life of a disciple, with the heart given up to the delight of evil. One by one he asked them, priest and peasant, scholar and boor, strong heart and weak, if he were so blind he did not recognize himself. There was no self-deception among them then; it melted before the fiery words of the preacher. Stately heads were bent, in shame and humiliation; confusion sat on foreheads that were wont to rear themselves haughtily before the eyes of men, telling their fellow-mortals they were infallible. The weak bent down and wept; the proud of heart were abashed; the callous groaned in horror and dismay, as each one beheld his own image drawn with skilful hand. But who was callous, who trembled not as the preacher, waxing more eloquent with the terror of his subject, went on to describe to each his own appropriate punishment, and to all the horrors, as he told them, the heart of each man answered, "It is mine." They had all heard of hell before, but never known its tortures as they did then. He made them feel it, not as a vision, an idea, a thing which might be, but as though its agonies were already on them—none the less real that the anguish was of the soul alone. No words had ever before described to them the full measure of bitterness contained in that loathing self-abhorrence, that bitter confession wrung out amid their woe, "All this is but the natural fruit of what I have been, what I am;" the vain, intense remorse: the hate and rage against all things human and divine; the wild despair, the hell within, the hell without, and this to be eternal—not for awhile, nor for a million of years, nor with hope of any end; not changing, nor fluctuating, nor abating; with no Past, no Present, but one eternal agony, through one eternal Now.

As the people listened, the heart of the hardened became humble with terror; the tears of the weak ceased to flow for very horror; the cold sweat stood upon the brow and a fearful repentence fell upon all. They had been held over the gulf of fire; they had seen the smoke of hell, and, self-convicted, felt that thither their lives of seeming faith were leading them. What men would repent then, if they did not! Did the mighty preacher think so, too? Did he leave that to themselves as inevitable? Or why was it he did not urge them to turn to God, the God of Love, win His mercy, find His sure refuge? He had shown them clearly what they were: he had taught them beautifully what they might enjoy; he had told them with a terrific eloquence what the lost shall suffer. Was this enough, that now he dismissed them with a brief but most impassioned address to the might, the majesty, and the wisdom of God. So wild, so earnest it seemed, as if it burst from him, whether he would or not, but without a single prayer, and without the customary blessing.

Slowly, and as if awaking from an awful vision, the congregation broke up; the monks went back to their cells and the peasants to their homes, with chastened hearts and stricken pride, for each man knew himself; and the raging storm of the night before had left no plainer marks of its fury on the peaceful landscape than you might see in the altered demeanor and contrite faces which proclaimed the tempest that had swept through their breasts. Had it cleared the atmosphere their souls must breathe henceforth? Surely, yes! There was not one among them ever forgot the impression of that startling appeal; no, not even to his dying day. It would rush unbidden on the memory when least wished for, after having slumbered for years—blotting out, in an instant, all sense of pleasure, all desire of enjoyment, in the remembrance of its own surpassing horror; of the bitter tears wrung from seared eyes, and the vows of repentance made—many and deep—that day. Were they kept? Yes, for awhile; and most of them but for awhile. It is not in the fierce heats and sweeping thunder-gusts of summer that the seed takes root and puts forth its first feeble life, but in the quiet spring-time under gentle showers. The repentance of terror and dismay is not unto salvation. Before the close of that year, of all who listened to the wonderful preacher one only held steadily towards the end, and who was he? He was a youth of many passions, many infirmities, whose life had been stained by such sinful thoughts and evil deeds as at times made even his own soul shudder, for, with all his wickedness, the desire of good was still with him. He had joined the brotherhood not long before the visit of Paul, because he really believed that convents were places to which the weary and the weak withdrew from the temptations of the world to repent and pray. A short time served to undeceive him, and he saw that it was not there that he could fly from the dangers that threatened to overwhelm him—there, where sloth, voluptuousness and tyranny had as full, or fuller scope, than in the great world he fled from. He found the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life around him still, as strong as ever. He was restless and unhappy, disgusted with all around him and discontented with himself, and rejoiced at the unhoped-for removal from what to him was a scene of daily disappointment, when the Superior selected him to guide Brother Paul to a distant monastery, whither the holy man wished to proceed with the first light of day.

Their road led them far up into the hills behind the monastery, and as they travelled on among the lonely mountains, now shadowed by the gloom of overhanging cliffs, now coming out into the morning sunshine, and breathing the fresh invigorating breeze, Brother Paul argued with the young man, to show him, that not only from the dire teachings of experience, but from the calm use of his own reason, Man should know that all his struggles to become aught but what he finds himself are vain, that his magnificent powers and hard-gained sciences may smooth, brighten or protect his course through life, but can avail him nothing, in abating one iota the curse of a justly offended God.

Startled by what, under the mask of religion, kept only just within the bounds of daring blasphemy, but not at all overawed by the dark monk's powerful eloquence, the young champion buckled to the fight. It was an unequal one, however. The vast knowledge, clear reasoning and subtly-chosen language of the elder man, again and again left the youth without an answer, yet—strange perverseness—as far from convinced as ever. At last his companion said:

"Young man, thy spirit does not yield conviction to the plainest proof. Why art thou so blind, so simple or so stubborn? Thou canst neither deny, nor refuse aught that I advance, yet thou believest not. Let not idle vanity thus darken thy intellect, I pray thee. It is thy Maker's gift."

"Not in vanity, but in humility, I disbelieve thee, brother," answered the young man. "My youth and immaturcness are no match for thy trained and ripened powers. When thou reasonest thus of Life, Death, Evil, and the great Hereafter—all the mysterious things within us and beyond us—thou seemest as one showing a child a wondrous puzzle and saying, 'Explain it,' which thou knowest it cannot, and thyself couldst do. Thus I believe thee not, though all thou sayest seems so true. A riddle is but half a thing, a tangled web of nonsense without the answer. Thou hast given me a riddle—dark and horrible it seems—but somewhere in the universe there is an answer to shed light upon its gloom, and I can find it, though perhaps not now—not at once. It is a strange thing for thee, my elder and instructor to do. Why thou shouldst have done it I cannot tell; but I know thou art a wayward man, little regarding the beaten track and customary forms of other men."

The strong man groaned and his dark face was convulsed as though with a great agony, but he replied: "I will tell thee, young man, why it was. I have desired to have thee that I might sift thee as wheat; but, behold, thou art not for me. With thee I have failed. The love of God is in thee. But in yonder monastery, it was not so. I offered up no prayer there, because I have refused to pray; I gave no blessing, because I came not with a blessing, but with a curse. I came not to save, but to make condemnation deeper. I taught you herd-to fear God, but it is not in their hearts to love Him. I taught them to flee from His wrath, but what shall that avail them, if they fly not to His mercy? It shall be their greater damnation that they have felt remorse, yet have not repented; that they have beheld the vileness of their sins, yet have not forsaken them. They have delighted in evil, and evil shall be their lot; they have seen their leprosy, and said it was good; though I—even I—have described to them the horrors of hell, the torments of the damned, the reward of evil, as I, only I, can do; for every pang I have described was raging in my soul—all the anguish I told them of they felt through me. It was in me then, and now, and forever, for I am Satan—I am Hell!"

Then Satan left that young man, and went he knew not whither; and the youth went on his way, rejoicing in the mercy and love of God, and long since, his bones are bleached in the earth, and his spirit has found the Truth. But the monks of that monastery and the peasants of that valley in a short time lived the same life and loved the same evil as they had done before; and they saw the monk Paul no more till the day when they met him in his own place.

THE CRISIS NATIONAL, NOT POLITICAL.

THE following extract from a late contribution to the Bulletin is of vital interest just now. It exhibits more cultivation than usually characterizes political articles, and more earnestness than is apt to go with that kind of careful rhetoric where opinion takes the place of conviction. It is deserving, too, of a more responsible signature than "Kuzzilbash," which, somewhat queerly, suggests an Oriental imprecation. Except an appreciative article on the late Mr. King, this clever writer has done nothing better than the following:

To the Southern mind Lincoln is a sort of Jibbenainosay, the incarnation of an evil spirit which has spread desolation over the South, bereaved its hearth-stones, and which stands with a "flaming sword" over its cities. The rebels detest him, as it is natural they should detest the power which is subduing them. And yet he is only the priest through whom the God speaks; he is the missionary of that Progress which, for eighteen hundred years has been struggling with wrong, and whose triumphs are those of Christian civilization. He represents a principle which is indestructible—which, landing with the Puritan on a dreary coast, in mid-winter, survived the icicle and the scalping knife, and which has projected the proudest glories of our American civilization. Deride the Puritan as we may, in him stirred and acted the inspiration of the highest moral and intellectual power; a power that has expressions not limited to the triumphs of peace, for such is its wonderful versatility that it adapts itself to war as if the status militant was the object of its peculiar fitness and quality. Your Cavalier, with his fiery and passionate nature, cannot match the cool, reasoning and practical Puritan. The one reminds you of the eccentric Aerolite, flashing fearfully in its erratic course; while the other has the steady march of a planet sailing through its well-defined ellipsis with an equipose and nicety of motion to which the precision of human mechanism is disorder. This war made political excuses for its necessity, but looking at it philosophically, you find it clearly traceable to the moral antagonism of sections.

It is a good argument against McClellan that the South, having previously declared its unalterable determination to secure its independence, favors his election; and while one cannot clearly see how that independence is to be accomplished, yet the argument loses none of its strength on this account. To all good Union men there is force and reflection in this friendliness of our Southern brethren, that sort of force which at once suggests a note of alarm, and a rigid scrutiny as to its objects and ultimate effects. If McClellan is acceptable to rebels, then patriots will discard him; and while I have every confidence in his purity, intelligence and loyalty, the masses have not. In the discussions of the merits of the two candidates it is sheer folly to attempt to drag down McClellan. The whole argument lies in a different direction, and it is strong enough to dispose of the whole question. It is, that a change of Administration in the face of an enemy would not only be highly detrimental to the country, but would be a confession of weakness and error that would bring nothing but ruin to us; and further, that if McClellan should die, the Government would pass into the hands of a man who is about as bitter and confirmed in his Copperheadism as a man can be. At this crisis we cannot afford to accept the responsibility of chance. We must be certain of our men, and then we provide for all the contingencies which may happen. Experiment now is to place in jeopardy all we have and all we hope for. We must be assured of the approved loyalty of the party to which we propose to entrust the great and vital interests we have. With the present Administration we will be certain that the war will go on, but with the other there are grave doubts of it. We know that the South sees in the election of McClellan some positive or probable benefit to itself, and that the continuance of Lincoln is the declaration that the American people will proceed with this war just so long as one armed traitor raises aloft the emblem of misrule and wrong. It has ridiculed all intimations of compromise, it avows its determination to achieve its independence or perish. Any cessation of hostilities with a view to a Convention is the craziest party-cry that could be raised. When the South favors such a proposition it can only be with the belief that, if the action of such a Convention does not end in separation, time will be had to strengthen itself, to collect its resources, recruit its exhaustion, and so fit it to go on with the war, hoping to the last for dissensions at the North, and perhaps foreign interference. * * *

Personal preferences should be discarded in this crisis. Individuals are nothing save as they represent the ideas and purpose of the people at large. Principles must govern now; and fortunately those that are involved are not abstruse and difficult of comprehension—on the contrary, they are as clear and self-evident as the simplest mathematical postulates. They merely declare that a robber is at your throat, who seeks to strangle you, and that you must shake him off, even at the expense of his life. When you have crippled him so that all power to harm is gone, you can then listen to the pleadings of philanthropy and mercy. The whole question is narrowed down to that of National existence. Must we parley when our enemy jeers at compromises? must we send him flags of truce and peace commissioners when he calls us dogs, spits upon and derides our very offer as pusillanimous? From the very day of the surrender of Sumter until now, the rebels have exhibited a contempt for the North and a persistent and ruthless vindictiveness, which, if it is brutality to follow and emulate, has nevertheless wholesome teachings. The declarations of its public men, the uniform spirit of its press, and the individual deportment of almost all Southerners are all characteristic of the derision, hostility and determination of our enemies; and that man who supposes that the election of McClellan will so far abate that enmity and resolution of the South as to permit a conference that has for its aim a reconstruction, is strangely ignorant of the South and a dull observer of the times. This war is a civil war, and we must slay or be slain. If we would preserve our national existence, we must determine to use all means and our most resolute efforts to conquer the South—there is no other word to express it; and the sooner we accept this necessity, the sooner the contest will cease. It is sheer nonsense to talk of carrying on a war of this character under the Constitution. That instrument cannot be invoked by rebels who have abated no human efforts to destroy it; neither can their abettors claim its protection. Loyal men—who are determined to see the thing out—have no fault to find with occasional arbitrary arrests. One naturally questions the patriotism of those who, with the word Union in their mouths, are nevertheless accusing the Administration of tyranny and cruel and wanton invasion of personal rights and privileges. It is a miserable subterfuge, at a crisis like the present, to ask whether this or that step is sanctioned by the law and precedent made from peaceful times. Davis and all in authority with him can violate every good principle which enters into the scheme of Christian civilization, and yet one hears no remonstrance or complaint from those who are foremost in their denunciations of Lincoln. In no history and at no period of the world can one point out a nation that, during the status of war, was guilty of so few oppressions and exactions, and where personal liberty has been so unrestrained and unrestricted as under the present Administration.

CAUSES OF THE WAR.

THE Rev. Horatio Stebbins, in his speech at Platt's Hall, drew the following logical analysis of the causes of the present war:

Perhaps the fairest generalization as pertaining to the origin of our American history, is to say that it is the result of two confluent streams rising in widely different regions of human life and thought. The Puritan held a principle greater than he knew, which, when carried to its legitimate and logical conclusions, was universal liberty. The Cavalier held a principle, either consciously or unconsciously, which, when carried to its legitimate and logical conclusion, was the love of power and the dominion of a class. These two principles, forgetting their differences in the common struggle for independence, blended in the formation of the government, and the fathers, grounding the Constitution in freedom, acknowledged the presence of slavery. The tone of the country concerning slavery was apologetic. It was held as a moral, social, and political evil, which required a little time for its remedy and adjustment. The South was more anti-slavery at that time than the North. The cotton gin, that terrible engine for the degradation of man's moral nature to his interests, lay yet undiscovered amid the hidden powers of mechanic arts. A mighty wind was rising to sweep Christendom, kindling into flame the moral abhorrence of men for the slave trade. Wilberforce was just out of school, and the preparations of history were making in great thoughts of heart. Christianity, the interpreter of man's nature to man, had brought another star above the horizon of human intelligence. The morning of a new era had dawned, and the East tingled with the promise of universal emancipation.

The two civilizations which were planted on these shores in Puritan and Cavalier, stood side by side or blended and mixed in each other. The belief, the expectation, the hope of the fathers, was that the young and vigorous life of freedom would absorb and carry off the virus which had not yet struck the vitals of the State. Freedom will dissolve slavery, as the morning, by steadily ascending powers, dissolves the night. This was the common faith and the common hope: and they were well grounded, so far as human judgment could discern. They were in accordance with the increasing moral convictions of Christendom, and they were in accordance with what seemed to be the great social and economic interests of the country.

But here we come to where the ways divide, and the course of history has disappointed human expectations. The two civilizations, the two theories of social order, instead of the one absorbing the other, drew apart and established a dividing line, each one claiming its own rights, privileges and immunities, thus bringing into the established operations of the Government a system of compromises, a theory of accommodation, not merely as between conflicting interests of widely separated regions, but between two principles of government, two ideas of social order. The original compromises of the Constitution, established in the expectation that, through them, slavery would pass peacefully away, were construed into another sense, and enlarged to a wider meaning—even to the extent of making slavery permanent and enduring. The Government was no longer administered from its central idea as founded by the fathers, but lost its purity of blood, and became a mongrel, hybrid scheme. * * * *

And this brings me to the very pitch and quick of the rebellion, as I wish to present it to your consideration. The rebellion, so far as its moral and social polity are concerned, is an attempt to set up and promulgate this new philosophy, or rather, this old philosophy, in the face of an advancing civilization. It is an attempt to overthrow this Government and establish a social order based on a servile race. It has adopted slavery, the outcast of Christendom, baptized it in the name of religion, sworn it on the holy evangelists, and made it the basis of social polity and morals. The conflict is a conflict inevitable between two civilizations, in which one or the other must be destroyed. Here at this point all the nerves of the war centre. The following remarkable statement of principles and objects from the point of view of the rebellion is explicit enough: "Two opposite and conflicting forms of society cannot, among civilized men, coexist and endure. The one must give way and cease to exist, the other become universal. If free society be unnatural, immoral, unchristian, it must fall and give way to slave society, a social system old as the world, universal as man." Although the war is not merely of man's passion or device, but the historic development of two conflicting theories of society, so far as men are the direct agents in it, its prime object, or second only to the personal ambitions of designing men, is to enforce upon the world, and upon the country in particular, the Southern morals and civilization. We talk of making war, and of making peace. But in a certain and very important sense there is no such thing. War is a result, and peace is a result.

MISTS.

THE shadowy mists are rising
From the quiet face of the Bay,
And far through the Gateway Golden,
To the distance dim and gray,
Fold after fold,
White, still and cold,
They silently fade away.

And faint as a taper's glimmer,
Shines out o'er the eastern height,
Through the silv'ry cloud-folds draping
The amethyst arch of night,
The first star-beam
And the wavering gleam
Of the slow moon's dawning light.

My thoughts float away like the vapors
Borne back by the restless breeze
To the scenes of a boyish passion,
And of manhood's memories—
The shining strand
Of an orient land,
Far over the circling seas.

And I see, in a dim dream-picture,
A night in the warm mid-June:
The one white sail low-skimming
The waves of the blue lagoon,
And the one pale star
That followed far
In the wake of the low, white moon.

I feel the soft, warm flutter
Of a girlish hand in mine;
Catch the gleaming of golden tresses,
Moon-bathed in a glow-divine;
And the airy grace
Of a perfect face,
Up-raised, with its saint-like shrine.

Oh, love of the Then and Forever!
Far away in the starry spheres,
Have you known of my soul's mad worship?—
Made pure by its widowed tears!—
Or seen the pain
Of my tortured brain,
And the heart that has wept for years?

How closely the gates of Heaven
Are barred to the world below,
Else the pulse of my earthly sorrow
Had thrilled to your soul, I know—
Had brought some sign,
Oh, angel mine!
To the heart that loved you so.

Ah, mists of the moaning ocean—
Less white than the look she wore—
Hide the land of my dream, forever,
(With the grave on its quiet shore,)
And banish the thought
That the night has brought,
Of a day that can come no more.

THE ADVENTURES OF A LADY IN SEARCH OF A HORSE.

CHAPTER III.

STABLE SECRETS—SHOWING HOW THE BROWN COB BRUTUS BECAME THE PROPERTY OF "KNOWING NED," AND THE BLIND MARE THE PROPERTY OF MISS APPLEGARDE.

GLORIANA escaped the designs of that villanous individual "Knowing Ned," whatever they might have been, for a whole week. She was, indeed, regularly used up; and, notwithstanding her courage and determination, she was unable to conceal the fact from the watchful eyes of her mother and sister, and was, consequently, absolutely forbidden to ride again until she had recovered her usual amount of strength, or rather the same amount of it that she possessed when she had consulted the London doctor. On the eighth day from the date of her first ride, Knowing Ned becoming anxious, like all plotters, to put his design into execution, made a point of meeting Mr. Wells as he took his short daily walk to the village post-office; and pulling his forelock with the same amount of respect he would have shown to a master had he possessed one, he thus addressed him:

"The cob's wery fresh, Mr. Wells; he'll be too much for the young lady if she don't keep him in exercise; he's got a temper, too, of his own; and them low-bred 'uns is apt to get tricky."

"Good gracious! what is to be done, then?" was the butler's reply. "It's a take in, if the cob ain't quiet; because we advertised for a quiet one, 'to carry a lady.'"

"He ain't quiet now—leastways he's very free with his heels in the stable; and I don't see no chance of his getting quiet standing eating his head off in the stable, and nothing taken out of him noways."

With these ominous words, which filled his hearer with apprehension, and causing him to give utterance to those peculiar signs of lamentation made with the tongue and palate of the mouth, Knowing Ned turned away, and hobbled slowly in the direction of the stable. A few minutes afterwards he was followed, as he had foreseen, by Mr. Wells, who was anxious to ascertain the state of the brown cob's temper with his own eyes, and who, before he got to the door, became aware, through the medium of another organ, that an active encounter or trial of strength was going on between him and his personal attendant, while in tones of remonstrance the latter addressed his charge: "You would, would you!—Quiet, you varmint, will you!—Come up!—Stand still!—Go over!" while as Mr. Wells cautiously peered round the stable-door, two iron-shod heels flashed within a yard of his face, causing him to retire with precipitation, heedless of the invitation addressed to him by Ned to come in and see what a "wicious brute" he had to deal with; or to lay his hand upon his quarters, and just see "if he didn't let out." Unwilling to put the irascible temperament of the cob to any personal test, he heartily concurred with the remark that "he was not fit for a lady noways;" and as he hastened the preparations for tea, which, in an establishment so entirely feminine, was, as I need scarcely observe, the meal of the day, he resolved upon disburdening his mind on the subject of the brown cob's disqualifications during the progress of that social repast.

Gloriana herself paved the way for the observations he intended to make by saying, "I shall be able to ride again to-morrow: the stiffness is quite gone off; and Brutus will be getting too much for me if he has neither exercise nor work."

"I am very much afraid that he won't suit, after all," Miss Gloriana," said Wells, pompously. "I am afraid he is full of vice: he nearly killed Ned and me in the stable to-day."

"Oh, horses are often very vicious in the stable that are very quiet out!" was the reply. "There is War Eagle, up at the Park, who is as quiet as a lamb when he's mounted. And there's only one of the helpers that he will let dress him over; and he nearly killed him once."

"Dear me!" said Mrs. Applegarde; "how dreadful! And how did you hear that, my dear?" she added, while, luckily for Gloriana's sake, whose color, ever rosy, had become deep crimson at the question, she waudered on in a way that was habitual with her. "But it really is such an undertaking having anything to do with horses with no gentleman to consult, and so much roguery and deception going on. I do so much regret that your poor dear uncle, who always had such fine horses, and so beautifully kept, should have died just when he did—not, of course, on that account only, but such a loss as he was to his family. Like your poor dear papa, my dears, excepting that he was never such a domestic man, and not so tall or good looking, either—not such an Applegarde, in fact," said the widow, drawing herself up, and glorying in the name of the husband whom she had idolized, and to whom, in the freshness of her remarkable beauty, she had also been all in all. Perhaps, had he lived, the great simplicity of her character, which was an additional charm in early youth——. But why should I suggest any doubt as to his constancy under a contingency not fated to occur? Why should we despise simplicity even in mature age, when it is the sign of the innocence of a nature that contact with the world can neither sully nor efface? Let simplicity grow old if it can. If it sometimes weary us, it must command, nevertheless, our love and our respect. There are depths and heights both of evil and of good which must be hid from such natures evermore. But while the strong currents wrestle in the deeps, and the storm clouds gather on the mountain tops, let the sunbeams play gently on the shallows of life: all are beautiful: it is we who are blind in only allowing beauty in what we can appreciate and understand. Mrs. Applegarde's nature was a very simple but a very loveable one; and I was wrong in hinting that had her husband lived he would have found it less attractive than in the fresh spring time of early youth. I am sure, upon reflection, that I was quite wrong.

"I shall try Brutus again to-morrow, at all events," said Gloriana, taking up the thread of the subject which she and Mr. Wells had had under discussion when her mother had ambled off on her favorite palfrey of somewhat disconnected reminiscences; "it will not be easy to get rid of him if he does not suit."

"I am afraid not, miss," was the reply; "but there's no knowing; and things do turn up sometimes unawares"—a maxim in the philosophy of human affairs, which none of Mr. Wells's audience felt inclined either to gainsay or refute; indeed, as he disappeared with short, quick steps under the weight of the tea-urn and his own increasing flesh, Mrs. Applegarde remarked, enthusiastically, "I really don't know what would become of us without James," so entirely had he impressed his mistress with the idea that he was a necessary unit in the scheme of her existence—the unit, in fact, which gave importance and meaning to the three cyphers which, in all matters of business (or horseflesh) she considered herself and her daughters to be.

As Knowing Ned the next day saddled Brutus for Miss Applegarde to ride, there was a latent sparkle of triumph to be observed in the corner of his most knowing eye, which did not diminish as the cob made his exit from the stable with a playful flourish of his heels, and with a snort which betrayed to the experienced in such things that he was "full of fettle and play."

"Ware heels!" cried Ned, in tones of caution to Mr. Wells, who was ambling slowly and cautiously round the palfrey, with a view of ascertaining that he was "all right" before his young mistress mounted; and before the words were well out of his mouth, Brutus indulged in a kick which had for its object the person of the valued domestic, to whom he appeared, indeed, to have conceived a great personal aversion.

"'Ow on earth is Miss Gloriana to get up, I should like to know, with the brute lashing out in that way," said the butler, with great asperity; and surveying the clumsy form of the handsomest cob in England with but little trace of his former admiration and approval.

"She ain't afraid, I knows," was the answer intended for Gloriana's ears, who appeared at that moment ready equipped, and followed by Mrs. Applegarde and Kate, who shared the fears of Mr. Wells with regard to the cob, and who were both nervously anxious as to the result of the ride.

"I must have a chair, I believe," said Gloriana, who blushed a little at the idea of the implied inexpertness both of the mounter and the mountee; but the chair having been placed, after some little display of resistance on his part, by the side of the horse, she displayed great quickness and nimbleness in mounting thence to his broad back.

No sooner was she in the saddle, and the reins gathered "nohow," as Ned afterwards observed, in her hand, than Brutus, left to his own devices, kicked over the chair which had been a source of annoyance to him; and finding that in so doing he had hurt his own heels, he kicked again spitefully more than once, so that Gloriana with difficulty kept her seat, and was fain to cling for life or death to the pommel of her saddle, which, being an old-fashioned one supplied from the stock of the village saddler, possessed that appendage in a more developed state than is necessary now in the improved state of things with regard to modern side-saddles, the tall, awkward crutch on the off side being now entirely done away with, and the balance preserved by what is, in fact, only a second pommel placed in a different position.

"He'll be all right presently, Miss," said Knowing Ned, who in his own mind had planned that Gloriana should have enough of the cob's antics that day to sicken her of him at once and for ever. "Just give him his head, and take it out of him a bit, right down the common. He'll be quiet enough after a bit."

Fallacious hope! No sooner did Brutus find under his hoofs the short elastic turf of Ambledown Common, than, mad from the effects of his long holiday and four feeds of corn daily (with which Ned had supplied him, for purposes best known to himself,) he commenced a series of plunges and jumps which were terrible to look at, and still worse to experience.

"What a beast you are!" said poor Gloriana, shaken to death, and really hurt with the violence of the cob's movements. "I can never do anything with you, I am quite sure, so it's no use attempting it;" and turning his head towards home, she intended to take him back, and give up all attempts to ride him for the future. But, alas! even that little space she was not destined to traverse in safety, for the over-fed and underbred cob finding his head turned towards the stable which had proved such a Paradise to his sensual nature, gave a final bound and twist, which succeeded in dislodging Gloriana from the saddle; and as she lay prostrate on the turf, which was luckily soft with recent rain, he galloped home, snorting and riderless, to frighten the inmates of the cottage almost to death on the spot. Gloriana herself was the least frightened of all, except, perhaps, the wicked author of the mischief, Knowing Ned, who had fed up Brutus in the hope of the present result, and who, having his wits more about him than any of the rest of the party, and notwithstanding the splint in his off leg, ran down the coach-road and out upon the common with the speed of an agile demon to offer his hypocritical condolences to the victim of his own craftiness.

"You ain't hurt, miss, I 'ope," he said, as Gloriana picked herself up, and proceeded to walk with rather unsteady, trembling steps towards home. "I told Mr. Welles what a wicious varmint he was afore ever you got on his back."

"No, I am not hurt in the least," was the reply; "but I can see that the cob will never do for me. I am tired to death before I have been on his back five minutes."

"In course you be, miss. He ain't got no spring about him, he ain't; and he's a reg'lar low-bred 'un into the bargain. There's nothink like blood for a lady. I wos a-thinking this morning, miss, afore you went out, of a black mare that would suit you to a T."

"We have got to get rid of the cob before we think of getting another," said Gloriana, rather shortly, for she felt that the horsey man was rather too loquacious to be altogether agreeable; and she hastened on to assure her anxious mother that there were no bones broken, and that she was none the worse for the fall, with the exception of the shako. "But one thing I am certain of, mamma," she added, with a sigh, "and that is, that Brutus will never do! he is too rough and too full of tricks. And I am only very sorry that I persuaded you to buy him."

"Don't think about money, my child, where your precious health is concerned: there must be suitable horses to be had for money; and if your poor dear uncle had only lived, he would have given us the best advice of any one that I ever knew. We must get rid of this one, there is no doubt—nasty thing; if we only get ten pounds for him."

The plot which Knowing Ned had hatched in his artful brain would, he foresaw, through the innocence of his victims be very easily carried into execution. His brother, a vagabond horse coper, who wandered about the country from one fair to another, had upon his hands at that moment a black thoroughbred mare—aged, blind of one eye, and, as Ned would himself have described it, "screwed all over," which he had purchased at the high figure of three pounds ten, in the hope that he might be lucky enough to find some one willing to buy her for five.

That very afternoon a despatch was forwarded by a sure hand from the stable-room at Park Side, which, for brevity of expression and condensation of matter, might have formed a model to be studied with advantage by members of circumlocution offices, who manage to cover reams of paper without conveying a quarter of the meaning contained in the terribly dirty document, which ran as follows:

"Send the black mare back by bearer—I've got some flat uns. From bruther Ned."

It is scarcely necessary to add, after this, that the black mare duly arrived, or that she proved a good card in the hands of the vagabond horse coper and his knowing brother. She was a sweet-tempered, gentle beast, showing a great deal of blood; she had, indeed, in her palmy days, been a promising racing mare, but had broken down suddenly and irrevocably in the zenith of her fame, and had since been knocked about the world, being preserved only from utter ruin by various good qualities, which made her a pleasant hack. All her remaining advantages were now, however, sadly upon the wane. Her regular up and down lady's canter was becoming daily more wooden and unsafe. Her eyes were going; one, indeed, was quite gone: and she was in fact, a mere wreck, hardly worth the three pounds ten speculation by her latest purchaser. She was in very fair condition, never having had the misfortune to fall into bad hands, in the merciless sense of the words; and as she was led round and round the carriage ring, for the inspection and approval of the ladies, they all exclaimed, simultaneously, "What a pretty creature!" while the romance attending the name of Black Bess, her high-bred and gentle manners, and the way she had of insinuating her velvet muzzle into their caressing hands, decided the feminine council at once upon the expediency of the swop, which Knowing Ned had so artfully proposed. He was not likely to lose much by the transaction, for Brutus, the cob, was a valuable animal in his own line. Six years old, sound, strong as a camel, and with a camel's powers of endurance, he was quite worth the forty guineas which Mrs. Applegarde had paid for him, although not worth forty shillings to her; for had he been ever so quiet, his action in itself would have prevented any one so delicate in health as her daughter then was, from enjoying the exercise of riding him; and tricky and restive into the bargain, it was quite out of the question that she would be able to profit by his services. Notwithstanding the fall, however, and notwithstanding the shake, wonderful to relate, she was decidedly better. She had roused herself from the lethargy and languor into which she had been fast sinking, and the difficulties attending the attainment of the prescribed exercise excited, amused and interested her. Truly Sir Erasmus Globule deserved credit for the discernment which had foreseen such happy results.

Perceiving that his design was succeeding, even beyond his expectations, Knowing Ned was seized with a brilliant idea, and on the spur of the moment, and with unblushing effrontery, he said: "For tweuty guineas and the brown cob my brother would part with the mare; there's not a sweeter 'ack in the country than she is on road or turf."

"What do you think, Wells?" said Mrs. Applegarde, appealing to the family oracle, who, since his signal failure with regard to the cob, had been rather silent when the subject of a fresh purchase had come under discussion.

"I think Miss Gloriana had better try this one, in the first instance," he said, deliberately; "one can't always judge of a horse by the outside."

"I'll put the saddle on her at once, Miss," said Ned, suggestively. "She'll carry you like a lamb, and you'll see that there's no deception about her. She's no bone-crusher, she aint."

So Gloriana, being easy of persuasion with regard to adventure, determined upon trying Black Bess at once; and having mounted by means of the chair, the mare cantered away with her quietly down the coach road, and then quietly on to the smooth turf, with easy action, up and down like a rocking-horse, and holding her light head in a graceful arch from her neck—a very different thing from the heavy pull which the cob had maintained upon the weak hands of his rider.

"Oh, this is delightful! and you are a dear creature," was Gloriana's exclamation, as she rode up to the door, neither shaken nor exhausted, but with a healthy glow in the transparent cheek. "I feel, mamma, that this sort of riding will do me good."

"I wish I had said forty and the cob," said Ned to himself, as he saw the gratified looks of the whole party, and witnessed the caresses lavished on Black Bess, while Wells himself was not afraid to approach within three arms' length of the gentle animal. The bargain was concluded there and then, according to the first proposal, and the valuable mare was installed in the vacant place of Brutus, who, as he took his departure, was little regretted by any of the party, least of all by his particular patron, Mr. Wells, who had so strongly affected him in the first instance. Black Bess, on the coutrary, became quite a pet with the whole establishment, and some weeks had elapsed before anything occurred to throw a light upon the real value of the animal, for whom four times her value in money had been given, and the cob actually given away.

As far, indeed, as Gloriana's health was concerned, she had proved a good investment. The gentle exercise, without fatigue, which her easy action and light mouth afforded, did such wonders that in three weeks the country doctor pronounced that Miss Applegarde was in a fair way to the recovery both of her health and spirits. "But," he added, in a voice of warning, "you must be very careful how you ride, for that mare is far from safe, and the common ground is very rough and uneven in some places; if she were to come down there, she would give you a bad fall."

"Black Bess is as quiet as a lamb, doctor, I assure you," put in Mrs. Applegarde. "Gloriana tells me that it requires no exertion to manage her, and that is the great thing, after all, in her delicate state of health."

"Quiet she is, ma'am, I grant you, but not safe, nevertheless; and a blind horse, with shaky fore-legs, is scarcely a desirable mount for a young lady, who, with all the courage, has scarcely at present the best hand in the world," remarked the blunt doctor; while Gloriana blushed crimson with indignation at the slur thus cast upon her riding, and exclaimed, simultaneously with her mother and sister:

"A blind horse! You do not mean to say that Black Bess is blind, doctor?"

"One eye is going, and the other is already gone; and I believe," he added, "that the name of the animal has undergone a slight alteration lately, and that by changing three letters blind has become black, for your especial accommodation. I heard all about BLIND Bess at Hill Top Farm, where she is as well known as the postman, who has ridden her backwards and forwards on the turnpike road to Fairyard, every day for the last three years. She fell down with him so often that he sent her to the fair, where she was sold for three pound ten. I won't say who to, for fear of making mischief, but I could not hear all this without giving you warning, and putting you more on your guard."

"It must be really dangerous, my dear," said Mrs. Applegarde, addressing her daughter; "you know you have told me about her stumbling so much lately, and Ned put it down to her having been newly shod, but I do not like this account at all, and only trust that he knew nothing of the creature's antecedents when he brought her here."

"I know nothing about that," said the cautious doctor; "but I hope and trust that Miss Applegarde will ride her carefully, if she continues to ride her at all."

"I always do that," she replied; "and, indeed, you must not think of recommending me to give up riding, now that I am so fond of it, for if I do I shall certainly be ill again."

"Give up riding on no account, but ride with as much regard for your nerves as you can; and do not, above all things, trust to the perception of a blind mare when you gallop over rabbit commons with a loose rein."

"What stuff he talks," said Gloriana, peevishly, as he left the room; "he goes gossipping about at farm houses, and believes all the nonsense that they tell him. I am sure that Black Bess is perfectly safe myself."

Now that her eyes had been opened, however, to the unwelcome fact, she could not help recalling to mind that the mare did very often stumble, especially on rough or uneven ground, and that she relied entirely on the hand which guided her, which being an inexperienced, and, on that account, an undecided one, often courted the danger which it wished to avoid. It was but a week after the doctor's warning that she fell as she was galloping, propelling her rider over her head with some force to the ground, and cutting her own knees cruelly on the mound of gravel which had caused the accident. Poor Gloriana returned home somewhat crest-fallen, but fortunately not much hurt. A family council was held the next day, in which it was decided that poor broken-kneed Bess should be turned out in the meadow belonging to the cottage, and kept merely as a pet; for her sweet temper and affectionate disposition had won for her the regard of all the inmates of Park Side Cottage, and they agreed that for the services she had rendered she was entitled to a pension, or turn-out in clover, for the remainder of her natural life.

"She has done her part in bringing back your roses, my dear," said Mrs. Applegarde; "and she deserves my everlasting gratitude for that. And now there is a more difficult question to decide, and that is, What is to be done about getting another? And who," added the widow despairingly, "who are we to trust?"

"I have been thinking it over," replied Gloriana, musingly. "I heard from Miss Levison the other day, and she wishes me to have the Welsh pony, Taffy, until they return from abroad. Perhaps it will be the best plan after all; and, as I ride alone, it will be easier to get on and off, and to open and shut gates; don't you think so, Kate?"

"Would they not allow us to buy the pony?" suggested Mrs. Applegarde. "I do not much like being under an obligation, even to the Levisons."

"Perhaps they think the obligation would be the other way," said Gloriana, proudly; "they ask me, as a favor, to use the pony, and I have reason to know that they mean what they say."

As Gloriana had mentioned only Miss Levison's name in the first instance, the substitution of the third person plural for that of the third person singular would have struck the ear of most mothers at once, for in that plural was included their very good-looking, manly and agreeable young squire and landlord, Ralph Levison, who had taken it into his head suddenly to go abroad for six months, no one knew why or wherefore, just before Gloriana's illness had alarmed her friends. But Mrs. Applegarde had not that instinctive penetrative faculty which makes a secret an impossible thing to a mother's eye. She did not know, and she could not see, that the motive which induced Gloriana to accept the offer of the Welsh pony, made to her by Mr. Levison through his sister, had something more in it than appeared on the surface; and when her daughter did all that she could do under the circumstances, viz., hint it to her, she did not take the hint.

The reader must exercise his own discernment upon this matter. It is not likely that he should be more discriminating than a mother; nor am I bound to reveal any secrets, or take any hints, before the appointed time. All that is necessary to say here, is that Taffy was located in the empty stall, and he became first favorite with Gloriana, who enjoyed upon his back what she began to call real rides. He was a handsome, strongly built, spirited pony, full of courage, and entirely free from vice. Over the wild breezy commons, in the rough and stony lanes, he was equally clever and safe as a hack, and Gloriana, although self-taught, was learning by daily experience to ride well. The only thing remarkable about this pony was his extraordinary appetite. The stable-bills which Mrs. Applegarde settled every quarter mounted up to fabulous sums; and when she remonstrated with Ned on the subject, the only remark that he vouchsafed in reply was:

"Them Welsh ponies is hawful ones to feed; and Miss Applegarde won't have him stinted, anyhow."

"Of course; no one wishes him to be stinted," replied his easy mistress; "and if he wants it, he must have it; but it seems to me quite extraordinary that a mere pony should eat so much."

"It's no objeck to me," said Knowing Ned, doggedly; "we will make him do upon less; but if he looks poor, I know who will get the credit of it when the young squire comes home."

And acting upon the dark threat which he had held out, he supplied poor Taffy with about half a feed of corn a day, out of a supply sufficient to keep two hunters in high condition for the ensuing quarter; so that the pony's ribs began to show even through the heavy coat with which nature had provided him.

"He looks worse and worse," said Gloriana, as she brought him in early one day, grieved to the heart to see him falling off so when she wished him to be looking his best. "Do you think that you give him corn enough?" she added, looking hard at Ned, who had not, it must be owned, enjoyed her perfect confidence since the suspicious affair of Black Bess.

"I gives him what the missus allows," he replied, saucily enough: "I can't do more by him nor that."

Gloriana flew to her mother to inquire into the meaning of this mysterious imputation, and extracted from her that she had certainly recommended retrenchment in the matter of the stable economy, but that she had expressly stipulated that the pony should have enough.

"He must have enough, if I have to pay for it out of my own pocket," was the hasty reply. "I can never send him back to the park with his bones staring out of his skin, in the way they are doing now."

And the next day she did in fact order two bags of corn from a friendly farmer, which she kept under lock and key, and from which, notwithstanding the black looks of the irregular groom, she administered three feeds daily to Taffy with her own fair hands.

"There will be no corn-bill for mamma this quarter," she said severely to that worthy, who looked terribly sulky at being outwitted in the tactics which the easy credulity of his mistress had suggested to his fertile mind. He had his revenge, however, and the pony was the sufferer after all.

"He'll put on no flesh till he's clipped, miss," he remarked to his young mistress, who was lamenting over Taffy's shaggy appearance; "he was always clipped up at the park long afore this."

"Was he?" Gloriana eagerly remarked. "We must get him done at once, then. I do not want them to see any difference in him when he goes back."

Taffy was clipped and singed accordingly; and with the additional supply of corn, and the superabundant flow of spirits induced by the loss of his thick greatcoat, he became almost too much for Gloriana, and as frisky without any vice as a pony could well be. The nights were frosty and cold, and Taffy's coat was very short; so that a window left open—by accident, of course—one bitter night, did the work that was to prove Knowing Ned's revenge for the interference of Gloriana in the matter of the stable economy. Taffy coughed twice the following morning; and the next day he coughed continuously; and the day after that Miss Applegarde heard the unwelcome news that the pony had inflammation in him, and that it was a chance if his life could be saved. A messenger was sent at once into Greyminster, on the blind mare, to summon the veterinary surgeon that the town afforded. He came with all speed, but only in time to find that the pony was beyond his aid; the sudden change from starvation to good feeding, and the exposure to the chilling night air in his newly-clipped state, had done its work. Taffy was indeed dying; and if the poor pony had been a Christian, as the saying is, the announcement could hardly have been attended with more genuine sorrow in the hearts of all concerned; while Gloriana herself was the victim of the most agonizing pangs of remorse. Knowing Ned, who had not intended or foreseen the fatal result of his work, lost no opportunity of impressing upon her mind that it was all her doing, and that the pony had been overfed; in which opinion he was confirmed by the doctor, who observed that there was more harm done by overfeeding ladies' pets—ponies or lap-dogs—than by the more healthy abstemiousness of less-favored animals. This was the last straw on the camel's back, which proved too much for Gloriana to bear. To be accused of being instrumental in the death of the poor pony, who had been her one thought and care since she had undertaken the charge of him—whom she had fed and caressed daily with her own hands, and ridden with as much care as though in his sturdy frame had been concentrated the glory and the value of all the horses in Christendom—oh, it was too much! and the burst of grief which followed the announcement must have touched even the heart of the author of the evil, if anything so human throbbed in his villainous breast. There was a Nemesis for him in poor Taffy's death, and this last stroke of diplomacy was fatal to his own cause. Gloriana absolutely refused to make any further efforts to procure either horse or pony to supply the lost favorite's place.

"It is absurd, in an establishment consisting entirely of women, attempting to have anything to do with horses," she said. "It's bad enough to have to tell the Levisons that Taffy is dead, without letting them think that I have thought so little of it as to set up another already in his place." The Levisons were, indeed, at that moment on their road home, so she knew not where to write to them to break the sad news of the pony's death.

"I do believe, Glorry, that you had rather it had been me," said Katie, rallyingly, as with a pale and harassed face her sister prepared for her walk to the park the day after the return of its inmates, to convey the first news of the misfortune herself.

"Do not laugh at me, Katie," was the reply; "but tell me what I shall say to Mr. Levison. I shall be quite ill with worry and anxiety before it is over."

"I thought Taffy belonged to Miss Levison," said Kate, archly. "You always talked as if Harriet had lent him to you."

"She made me the offer, of course," answered her sister, whose neck and temples were crimson as she spoke; "but the pony did not belong to her."

"Then, indeed, I do not think that you have much to be afraid of," Kate remarked, with a glowing smile. "Oh, Glorry, what a fool you must think me if you don't know that I know all about it!"

"Hush! hush!" said Gloriana, putting her hand over her sister's mouth; "there is nothing to know. And don't tease me, Katie, dear, for I am so very unhappy. Come to the park with me," she added, beseechingly; and the loving little sister, who saw that she really wished it, and who was full of genuine feeling under her fun, lost no time in putting on her hat and shawl, and was ready and waiting before Gloriana, who was still lingering, had slowly descended into the hall.

(To be concluded in our next.)

A TIGER YARN.—Col. Campbell, in his book recently published, is responsible for the following story: "We were closing in upon a wounded tiger, whose hind leg was broken. Some Bheels, who had run up the trail to a patch of high grass, were drawing back, now that their game was found, when the brute started up behind the elephant, and charged the nearest man, a little, hairy, bandy-legged, square-built oddity, more like a satyr than a human being. By the Prophet, sir, it would have done your heart good to see the springs the active little sinner made. Just in time he reached the tree, and scrambled into a branch, hardly out of reach. There he sat, crouched up into the smallest possible compass, expecting every moment to be among the Houris. The tiger made several desperate efforts to reach him, but the broken hind leg failing, he dropped back exhausted. It was now the Bheel's turn. He saw that he was safe, and accordingly commenced a philippic against the father and mother, sisters, aunts, nieces, and children of his hapless enemy; who sat with glaring eye-balls fixed on his contemptible little reviler, and roaring as if his heart would break with rage. As the excited orator warmed by his own eloquence, he began skipping from branch to branch, grinning and chattering with the emphasis of an enraged baboon; pouring out a torrent of the most foul abuse; and attributing to the tiger's family in general, and to his female relatives in particular, every crime and atrocity that ever was or will be committed. Occasionally he varied his insults by roaring, in imitation of the tiger; and last, when fairly exhausted, he leant forward till he appeared within the grasp of the enraged animal, and ended this inimitable scene by spitting in his face. So very absurd was the whole farce, that we, who were shoving up the elephant, in alarm for the safety of our little hairy friend, ended by laughing till our sides ached, and it was not without reluctance that we put an end to the scene by firing a death-volley."

GREAT MEN'S EYES.—"One might—one now and then can," says John Foster in his Diary, "throw one's whole soul through one's eyes in a single glance." Great men, especially great commanders, generally possess this remarkable power, which, like every other bodily or spiritual faculty, becomes all the stronger from its frequent use. "In the eyes of certain persons there is something sublime, which beams and exacts reverence. This sublimity is the concealed power of raising themselves above others, which is not the wretched effect of constraint, but primitive essence. Each one finds himself obliged to submit to this secret power, without knowing why, as soon as he perceives that look, implanted by nature to inspire reverence, shining in the eye. Those who possess this natural sovereign essence rule as lords or lions among men by native privilege, with heart and tongue conquering all."

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1864.

WHERE OUR BULLION GOES.

THE returns of treasure at this port from the interior, and the importations from British Columbia, during the past three years, have been severally :

	1861.	1862.	1863.
From the Interior.....	$41,689,077	$42,539,799	$45,327,326
From the Northern Coast..	.....	4,931,579	4,970,023
From British Columbia....	1,702,683	1,904,084	2,156,612
	$43,391,760	$49,375,462	$52,453,961

To these figures may be added the treasure which reaches this city in private hands and usually passes out of the country in its virgin state, of which no direct account can be made. The lowest estimate from reliable sources would place this sum at ten millions yearly, making the production of our mines for the year 1863 at least $63,453,961, of which the U. S. Branch Mint in this city coined about $20,251,419, leaving a balance of $43,202,542 unaccounted for, which must have been exported to China, England, France and other foreign countries. Included in the above total are the receipts from the silver districts for the year 1863, amounting to $12,455,915, (Nevada alone contributing $11,846,915 of the whole amount,) against $6,000,000 from the same sources in 1861. Large as these amounts appear, it is a fixed fact that the product of the precious metals is augmenting ; that the increase during the current year will be much greater than in the past, particularly of silver, which Nevada yields abundantly ; that the extent of capital invested in mining operations is enormous ; that men of every rank, profession and condition in life have embarked their means in these enterprises, and that this disproportion between the amount of bullion produced and the amount retained in the country, will continue to increase in the same ratio, unless some means are taken to check it. When we consider that our mines are opened almost entirely by native-born citizens or those who owe allegiance to the United States, that the greater part of capital is furnished by our people, and that our exports of the products of Agriculture, of the Herd, of the Forest, of the Sea, of Manufacture, and of the Vine, contribute to a very considerable degree to the payment of goods imported in the State, it becomes a question of very serious consideration why this drain of the precious metals to foreign countries continues, and what measures should be resorted to by the Federal Government to retain, in its own territory, the excess of gold and silver over the amount required to pay our indebtedness abroad. To do this clearly it will be necessary first to recapitulate the causes which have induced this continual foreign export.

First. Silver in the shape of fine bars, manufactured by private assayers, has been exported largely to China, by domestic and Chinese merchants in payment for goods imported in this State from there, and in obedience to orders from merchants in New York, who have recently found this method of remittance preferable to drafts on London and the remittance of sterling bills in reimbursement.

Secondly. Bar gold and silver was shipped hence via Panama to London, direct by British steamer on the Atlantic, to avoid the risk of capture by rebel pirates, as, owing to the diminished cost of insurance and the high rate for sterling bills in New York, shippers from here could realize more on their shipment, by sterling drafts from that point, than by shipments of the precious metals direct to a port in the United States.

Thirdly. The high charge which the Government levies for coinage at the Branch Mint, and the time hitherto consumed in paying deposits in a community where the rate of interest is 1½ to 2 per cent. per month, impelled the miner and merchant to have their gold and silver bullion manufactured into bars by private assayers—a cheaper method than to submit it to the tedious and more expensive process of coinage.

Owing to these causes, the precious metals, instead of being made part of the currency of the country, were and still are for the most part converted into bars, which at once become an article of merchandise, to be shipped to Europe and the East Indies. How to check this constant drain, and retain the product of our mines at home, becomes a question of vast importance. Making all due allowance for the necessities of trade and the inexorable laws of commerce and exchange, it seems to be entirely within the province and power of the Government to afford relief to a very considerable degree.

The necessity of protecting the steamers and treasure en route from Aspinwall to New York was officially urged upon the Department by the Superintendent of the Branch Mint in this city as a means of lessening the foreign shipment of bullion, and we learn that Government, acting under this suggestion, has lately established a regular convoy for each steamer. The creation of a Bullion Fund of $1,000,000, the result of suggestions from the same source, which has enabled the Mint to furnish quicker returns to the depositor, and in a measure to modify one of the causes of this extraordinary foreign export, has partly met the exigencies of this case, and is an earnest of the wish as well as the ability of Government to remedy the evil as far as it can by official action.

But a few things still remain to be done. The erection of a more commodious Mint Building, as determined by Congress, will increase the facilities of the San Francisco Branch for the coinage of the precious metals, particularly of silver. By interdicting the coinage of pieces smaller than the denomination of Eagles or perhaps of Double Eagles, the Government would necessitate the use of a larger amount of silver coin for purposes of change and convenience. By reducing materially the charge imposed for parting and coining, now double the price charged by private assayers and refiners, who are enabled in one day to convert bullion into a marketable article, at comparatively small cost to the depositor—the Government would be enabled to compete more successfully with parties who have hitherto offered superior advantages in a community where the value of money is so great. It is but just to the interests of the nation that all official and legitimate means should be employed to give to the people of the United States the advantages which ought to accrue to them from the possession of such large mineral wealth, but which they do not enjoy by reason of the inducements offered for shipments abroad.

NEW BOOKS.

The Poems and Ballads of Schiller, translated by Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Bart. From the last London edition. 16mo., pp. 407. New York : Clark & Maynard ; San Francisco : Roman & Co. 1864.

A beautifully bound volume of Bulwer's translation of Schiller—altogether one of the most neat and tasteful-looking books we have seen even in this era of skilful book-work and charming bindings. The volume is somewhat marred, we think, both in a literary and typographical sense, by the prefix of notes in small type. Perhaps the general reader will be more apt to recognize Bulwer than Schiller in these translations, and some of the more familiar pieces, such as "The Diver," "The Glove," and "The Bell," have been rendered into English with a more distinct flavor of the genius of the original by translators of less scholarship and literary reputation than the Baronet. We shall endeavor to make room for a few extracts next week. Throughout the work there is abundant evidence of the industry, learning and skill of the translator, who says :

"My general practice has been to translate line by line, and as literally as the transfer of thought from the verse of one language into the verse of another will permit. I have very rarely departed from this rule, except where it seemed expedient to give more distinct force to the poet's leading idea ; or where, in obscurer passages, it became necessary to translate the meaning as well as the words. For it sometimes happens that a construction literally verbal may be essentially unfaithful, render the sense unintelligible, or leave it exposed to total misconception—a danger of which Schiller himself was so aware, that, in his correspondence, he takes pages to explain what he desired to imply in a line. In such more difficult passages I have diligently reconsulted the best German authorities, and I have again to record my especial obligations to the distinguished critic to whom this translation is inscribed."

The Poems, Sacred, Passionate and Humorous, of Nathaniel Parker Willis. 16mo., pp. 370. New York : Clark & Maynard. San Francisco : Roman & Co. 1864.

This volume, bound in the same style as Schiller, contains those well-known productions in verse of this popular poet, which are still to be found in parlor annuals and poetic scrap-books. "No pent-up Utica" seems to have contracted Mr. Willis's powers, and in this little volume his muse ranges from "The Madonna" to "The Lady in the Chemisette with Black Buttons," who are both treated in an equally gentlemanly and gallant manner. The fair admirers of N. P. W. will find their hero elegantly enshrined in the green and gold of Messrs. Clark & Maynard.

A New Story-book for Children : By Fanny Fern. 16mo., pp. 310. New York : Mason Brothers. San Francisco : Roman & Co. 1864.

It is by no means an easy task to write a really clever book for children, and the effort has been thought not unworthy the genius of some of our best writers. The old-fashioned stories for children, with a moral or pious reflection impending at the close of every sentence, or the clumsily-adjusted mixture of didactic truth and saccharine rhetoric, administered like sulphur and treacle, for the moral health of the unhappy infant, are happily long since abandoned. The idea of pleasing children by writing down to their supposition level, and flavoring the work with a bland imbecility, is also exploded. Children are quick to appreciate truth and talent. But we fear Fanny Fern has leaned a little to the other extreme, and has adopted a style of grown-up sentiment and diction, which will fail to attract even precocious juvenility. In the very first sentence of her first "story," occurs the cheap French epithet, noms de plume, and a little further we find her talking of "meagre pecuniary remuneration," which is objectionable to the youthful mind, not so much from its syllabic quantity as its stilted and tinselled magnificence. There is not an infant but would have sympathized with Fanny had she said she had been "poorly paid." There is a certain rhetorical attitude about the following extract which we humbly protest against :

"We have seen, of a fine summer morning, after the sun shone out, fine gossamer threads, before invisible, floating, yet fixed, in the air above us. So, when the light of eternity shines on our life-path, shall these chords of a mother's love be seen to have entwined themselves around and about us—leading us in a way we knew not."

The conception and plan of the stories are ingenious ; they all have a vital significance and local application, and most of the young readers will have no difficulty in recognizing the original, in history.

Marble Isle, Legends of the Round Table, and other Poems. By Sallie Bridges. 16mo., pp. 273. Philadelphia : J. B. Lippincott & Co.; San Francisco : Roman & Co. 1864.

A collection of poems, of which "Marble Isle." an idyll, in blank verse, is the longest, bound in an exquisitely neat little volume. We shall give a few extracts next week. The most remarkable feature of the collection we observe in a passing glance at its pages, are the "Legends of the Round Table," a versification of the "Chronicles of King Arthur," in which the poetess seems to have drawn her inspiration from the same fount as Tennyson, and to have treated of those incidents which belong to the "Idylls of the King." She meets the anticipated charge of plagiarism by the following explanatory note :

"Several years before reading a line of Tennyson, I had met with the old romance of 'Prince Arthur,' translated from the French. Observing then the poetical nature of many of its incidents, I selected for future experiment most of those which afterwards formed the groundwork of these legends ; though some—'The First Meeting of Launcelot and Guinevere,' 'The King and the Bard,' and 'Avilion'—had their original entirely in my own imagination. The first six of the series were printed in the Evening Journal, of Philadelphia, in 1857 ; the next two were published in 1859, before the appearance of 'Idylls of the King ;' the rest were written since, with the exception of 'The Best Knight,' and 'The Last Meeting of Launcelot and Gninevere,' which were composed more than a year before, though not issued in the Home Journal of New York until some time after Tennyson's book came out."

Peterson's New Cook Book. Philadelphia : Peterson & Brother. San Francisco : Roman & Co.—A work invaluable to housekeepers, containing 858 new receipts.

OUR MILITARY POLICE.—We doubt not that the forebodings of riot and bloodshed on the 8th of November, that have been so freely indulged in, were modified to a great extent yesterday, if not entirely dissipated, when our citizens beheld Chief Burke's battalion of picked men—his volunteer police—filing through the streets, and marked their muscular frames, their resolute faces, the precision and promptness of their military evolutions and the martial bearing that distinguished them, individually and collectively. There were between four and five hundred men in the battalion, perhaps, and they were led by Commander-in-Chief Burke, and otherwise officered by the captains and sergeants of the Police Department. These new recruits have been exercised in the infantry manual twice a day for a month past, and an idea of the proficiency they have attained may be best conveyed by the fact that old soldiers who critically looked on at the review pronounced them about the best drilled men in the city. The community owe the Chief of Police their thanks for his industry and energy in organizing at such short notice, and bringing to a state of efficiency, this fine body of citizen soldiers—for getting ready this "ounce of prevention" in time to render future "pounds of cure" forever unnecessary.

NEW MUSIC.—M. Gray, music dealer, No. 613 Clay street, has sent us a song entitled, "How the Soldier Talks ;" words by Private Miles O'Reilly, music by John Wyatt—a melody not very stirring or original, in the key of F. Mr. Halpin's words are, as usual, vigorous, but hardly adapted to musical expression.

"We have heard the re-bel yell," is a line that would have troubled Mozart let alone Mr. Wyatt. The printer and publisher deserve credit for their good style of getting up sheet music.

SANITARY FUND.—The Executive Committee acknowledge the following further receipts since our last issue : Comanche, $341 15 ; Chico, $56 25 ; Cold Cañon, $28 50 ; West Butte, $5 60 ; Cañon Creek, $24 50 ; Windsor, $120 ; Unknown, per Wells, Fargo & Co., $24 ; Rough and Ready $100 ; Santa Rosa, $62 90 ; Alvarado, $55 ; Unknown, per Wells, Fargo & Co., $16 25 ; Red Dog, $21 50 : Soquel, $18 50 ; Cacheville, $13 65 ; Drytown, $75 ; San Antonio, Lower California, $150 ; San Francisco, $4,623 66 in coin and $262 in Legal Tender Notes. Total, $5,735 46 in coin and $262 in Legal Tender Notes.

THE RESTAURANT PERFECTED—FRENCH IDEA OF IT.—It is contemplated to open in London a monster restaurant, after the plan of Duval's establishment in Paris. The guests will be served by girls in uniform, and distinguished by numbers as the performers in the ballet of the Danaides. The bill of fare will be published daily, in the morning journals. The bread will be cut and the meat carved by machinery. The beer and other drinks will be delivered at each table, by pipes, laid under the floor, and the plates be brought heated upon small railway cars. A special apartment is reserved for customer's dogs, to be attended to by boys detailed for this purpose.

NOW.

THE Earth looks a desolate mother—
The Princess betrayed as of old—
The ermine stripped from her shoulders,
And her bosom all naked and cold.

But a smile breaks out from her anguish—
For she feels, with a glad unrest,
The throb of the unborn summer
Under her bare, brown breast.

INIGO.

DANIEL IN THE LION'S DEN—AND OUT AGAIN ALL RIGHT.

SOME people are not particular about what sort of company they keep. I am one of that kind. Now for several days I have been visiting the Board of Brokers, and associating with brokers, and drinking with them, and swapping lies with them, and being as familiar and sociable with them as I would with the most respectable people in the world. I do this because I consider that a broker goes according to the instincts that are in him, and means no harm, and fulfils his mission according to his lights, and has a right to live, and be happy in a general way, and be protected by the law to some extent, just the same as a better man. I consider that brokers come into the world with souls—I am satisfied they do; and if they wear them out in the course of a long career of stock-jobbing, have they not a right to come in at the eleventh hour and get themselves half-soled, like old boots, and be saved at last? Certainly—the father of the tribe did that, and do we say anything against Barabbas for it to-day? No! we concede his right to do it; we admire his mature judgment in selling out of a worked-out mine of iniquity and investing in righteousness, and no man denies, or even doubts, the validity of the transaction. Other people may think as they please, and I suppose I am entitled to the same privilege; therefore, notwithstanding what others may believe, I am of the opinion that a broker can be saved. Mind, I do not say that a broker will be saved, or even that is uncommon likely that such a thing will happen—I only say that Lazarus was raised from the dead, the five thousand were fed with twelve loaves of bread, the water was turned into wine, the Israelites crossed the Red Sea dry-shod, and a broker can be saved. True, the angel that accomplishes the task may require all eternity to rest himself in, but has that got anything to do with the establishment of the proposition? Does it invalidate it? does it detract from it? I think not. I am aware that this enthusiastic and may-be highly-colored vindication of the brokers may lay me open to suspicion of bribery, but I care not; I am a native of Washoe, and I will stand by anybody that stands by Washoe.

The place where stocks are daily bought and sold is called by interested parties the Hall of the San Francisco Board of Brokers, but by the impartial and disinterested the Den of the Forty Thieves; the latter name is regarded as the most poetic, but the former is considered the most polite. The large room is well stocked with small desks, arranged in semi-circular ranks like the seats of an amphitheatre, and behind these sit the th—the brokers. The portly President, with his gavel of office in his hand, an abundance of whiskers and moustaches on his face, spectacles on nose, an expression of energy and decision on his countenance and an open plaza on his head, sits, with his three clerks, in a pulpit at the head of the hall, flanked on either hand by two large cases, with glass doors, containing mineralogical specimens from Washoe and California mines—the emblems of the traffic. Facing the President, at the opposite end of the hall, is a blackboard, whereon is written in accusing capitals, "John Smith delinquent to John Jones, $1,550; William Brown delinquent to Jonas White, $475!" You might think brokers wouldn't mind that, maybe, but they do; a delinquent loses caste, and that touches his fine moral sensibilities—and he is suspended from active membership for the time being, and even expelled if his delinquency savors of blundering and ungraceful rascality—a thing which the Board cannot abide—and this inflicts exquisite pain upon the delicate nerves and tissues of his pocket, now when a seat in the Den is worth twelve or fifteen hundred dollars, and in brisker times even three thousand.

The session of the Board being duly opened, the roll is rapidly called, the members present responding, and the absentees being noted by the clerks for fines:

"Ackerman, (Here!) Adams, Atchison, (Here!) Babcock, Bocock, (Here!) Badger, Blitzen, Bulger, Buncombe, (Here!) Caxton, (Here!) Cobbler, Crowder, Clutterbuck, (Here!) Dashaway, Dilsou, Dodson, Dummy (Here!)"—and so on, the place becoming lively and animated, and the members sharpening their pencils, disposing their printed stock-lists before them, and getting ready for a sowing of unrighteousness and a harvest of sin.

In a few moments the roll-call was finished, the pencils all sharpened, and the brokers prepared for business—some with a leg thrown negligently over the arms of their chairs, some tilted back comfortably with their knees against their desks, some sitting half upright and glaring at the President, hungry for the contention to begin—but not a rascal of them tapping his teeth with his pencil—only dreamy, absent-minded people do that.

Then the President called "Ophir!" and after some bidding and counter-bidding, "Gould and Curry!" and a Babel arose—an infernal din and clatter of all kinds and tones of voices, inextricably jumbled together like original chaos, and above it all the following observation by the President pealed out clearly and distinctly, and with a rapidity of enunciation that was amazing:

"Fift'naitassfrwahn fift'nseftfive bifferwahn fift'naitfive botherty!"

I said I believed I would go home. My broker friend who had procured my admission to the Board asked why I wanted to go so soon, and I was obliged to acknowledge to him that I was very unfamiliar with the Kanaka language, and could not understand it at all unless a man spoke it exceedingly slow and deliberately.

"Oh," said he, "sit still; that isn't Kanaka; it's English, but he talks fast and runs one word into another; it is easy SOLD! to understand when you GIVE FIFTEEN-NINETY BUYER TEN NO DEPOSIT! come to get used to it. He always talks so, and sometimes he says THAT'S MINE! JIGGERS SOLD ON SLADDERY'S BID! his words so fast that even some of the members cannot comprehend them readily. Now what he said then was NO SIR! I DIDN'T SAY BUYER THIRTY, I SAID REGULAR WAY! 'Fifteen-eighty, (meaning fifteen hundred and eighty dollars,) asked for one, (one foot,) fifteen-seventy-five bid for one, fifteen-eighty-five buyer thirty,' (thirty days' time on the payment,) 'TWASN'T MY BID, IT WAS SWIGGINS TO BABCOCK! and he was repeating the bids and offers of the members after them as fast as they were made. I'LL TAKE IT, CASH!"

I felt relieved, but not enlightened. My broker's explanation had got so many strange and incomprehensible interpolations sandwiched into it that I began to look around for a suitable person to translate that for me also, when it occurred to me that those interpolations were bids, offers, etc., which he had been throwing out to the assembled brokers while he was talking to me. It was all clear, then, so I have put his side-remarks in small capitals so that they may be clear to the reader likewise, and show that they have no connection with the subject matter of my friend's discourse.

And all this time, the clatter of voices had been going on. And while the storm of ejaculations hurtled about their heads, these brokers sat calmly in their several easy attitudes, but when a sale was made—when, in answer to some particularly liberal bid, somebody sung out "SOLD!" down came legs from the arms of chairs, down came knees propped against desks, forward shot the heads of the whole tribe with one accord, and away went the long ranks of pencils dancing over the paper! The sale duly recorded by all, the heads, the legs and the knees came up again, and the negligent attitudes were resumed once more.

The din moderated now, somewhat, and for awhile only a random and desultory fire was kept up as the President drifted down the stock-list, calling at intervals, "Savage!" "Uncle Sam!" "Chollar!" "Potosi!" "Hale and Norcross!" "Imperial!" "Sierra Nevada!" "Daney!" the monotony being broken and the uncomfortable attitudes demolished, now and then, by a lucky chance-shot that went to the mark and made a sale. But when the old gentleman called "Burning Moscow!" you should have seen the fiends wake up! you should have heard the racket! you should have been there to behold the metaphorical bull in the China shop! The President's voice and his mallet went into active service, then, and mingled their noise with the clamors of the mob. The members thus:

"Sell ten forty-five cash!" "Give forty-three for ten, regular way!" "Give forty-one cash for any part fifty!" "Twenty thirty-eight seller sixty!" "Give forty-four for ten buyer thirty!" "SOLD!" (Down with your legs again, forward with your heads, and out with your pencils!) "Sell ten forty-three cash!" "Sold!" Then from every part of the house a din like this: "Ten more!" "Sold!" "Ten more!" "Sold!" "Ten more!" "Sold!" "Ten more!" "Sold!" "Ten—"

President (rap with his gavel)—Silence! Orfuplease, (order if you please,) gentlemen! Higgins ten to Smithers—Dodson ten to Snodgrass—"

Billson—"No, sir! Billson ten to Snodgrass! It was me that sold 'em, sir!"

Dodson—"I didn't sell, sir, I bought—Jiggers ten to Dodson!"

President—"Billson ten to Snodgrass—Jiggers ten to Dodson—Slushbuster ten to Bladders—Simpson ten to Blivens—Guttersnipe ten to Hogwash—aw-right! go on!"

And they did go on, hotter and heavier than ever. And as they yelled their terms, the President repeated after them—the words flowing in a continuous stream from his mouth with inconceivable rapidity, and melting and mingling together like bottle-glass and cinders after a conflagration:

"Fortwahnasscash fortray bidbortenn fortsix botherty fortsevnoffsetherty fortfourbiffertenn—(smash! with the gavel) whasthat?—aw right! fortfive offranparfortbotherty nodeposit fortfivenaf botherty bid fortsix biglerway!"

Which, translated, means: "Forty-one asked, cash; forty-three bid, buyer ten; forty-six, buyer thirty; forty-seven offered, seller thirty; forty-four bid for ten—(pause)—What's that? All right—forty-five offered for any part of forty, buyer thirty, no deposit; forty-five and a half, buyer thirty, bid; forty-six bid, regular way!"

And I found out that a "Bull" is a broker who raises the market-price of a stock by every means in his power, and a "Bear" is one who depresses it; that "cash" means that the stock must be delivered and paid for immediately—that is, before the banks close; that "regular way" means that delivery of the stock and payment must be made within two days; that it is the seller who "offers" stock, and the buyer who "bids" for it; that "buyer ten, thirty," or whatever the specified number may be, signifies the number of days the purchaser is allowed in which to call for the stock, receive it and pay for it, and it implies also that he must deposit in somebody's hands a fifth part of the price of the stock purchased, to be forfeited to the seller in case the full payment is not made within the time set—full payment must be made, though, notwithstanding the forfeit, or the broker loses his seat if the seller makes complaint to the Board within forty-eight hours after the occurrence of the delinquency; that when the words "no deposit" are added to "buyer thirty," they imply that the twenty per cent. deposit is not to be made, of course; that "seller thirty" means that any time the seller chooses, during the thirty days, he can present the stock to the buyer and demand payment—the seller generally selling at a figure below the market rate, in the hope that before his time is up a depression may occur that will enable him to pick up the stock at half price and deliver it—and the buyer taking chances on a great advance, within the month, that will accrue to his profit. Think of one of these adventurous "seller thirty's" "selling short," at thirty dollars a foot, several feet of a stock that was all corralled and withdrawn from the market within a fortnight and went to about fifteen hundred! It is not worth while to mention names—I suppose you remember the circumstance.

But I digress. Sometimes on the "second call" of stocks—that is, after the list has been gone through with in regular order, and the members are privileged to call up any stock they please—strategy is driven to the utmost limit by the friends of some pet wildcat or other, to effect sales of it to disinterested parties. The seller "offers" at a high figure, and the "bidder" responds with a low one; then the former comes warily down a dollar at a time, and the latter approaches him from below at about the same rate; they come nearer and nearer, skirmish a little in close proximity, get to a point where another bid or another offer would commit the parties to a sale, and then in the imminence of the impending event the seller hesitates a second and is silent. But behold! as has been said of Woman, "The Broker that hesitates is lost!" The nervous and impatient President can brook no silence, no delay, and calls out: "Awstock?" (Any other stock?) Somebody yells "Burning Moscow!" and the tender wildcat, almost born, miscarries. Or perhaps the skirmishers fight shyly up to each other, counter and cross-counter, feint and parry, back and fill, and finally clinch a sale in the centre—the bidder is bitten, a smile flits from face to face, down come the legs, forward the ranks of heads, the pencils charge on the stock-lists, and the neat transaction is recorded with a rare gusto.

But twelve pages of foolscap are warning me to cut this thrilling sketch short, notwithstanding it is only half finished. However, I cannot leave the subject without saying I was agreeably disappointed in those brokers; I expected to see a set of villains with the signs of total depravity hung out all over them, but now I am satisfied there is some good in them; that they are not entirely and irredeemably bad; and I have been told by a friend, whose judgment I respect, that they are not any more unprincipled than they look. This was said by a man who would scorn to stoop to flattery. At the same time, though, as I scanned the faces assembled in that hall, I could not help imagining I could see old St. Peter admitting that band of Bulls and Bears into Paradise—see him standing by the half-open gate with his ponderous key pressed thoughtfully against his nose, and his head canted critically to one side, as he looks after them tramping down the gold-paved avenue, and mutters to himself: "Well, you're a nice lot, any way! Humph! I think you'll find it sort of lonesome in heaven, for if my judgment is sound, you'll not find a good many of your stripe in there!"

TO THE CHARITABLE.—There are many noble institutions of charity in our midst, but none more entitled to veneration than the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. From the time of its foundation by the devout Christian whose name it bears, to the present, the good works of the society have been felt and appreciated. During the two years of its existence in San Francisco, no less than one thousand destitute persons have been relieved by it. Although it is professedly an auxiliary to the Catholic Church, yet its charity is not sectarian in its character—no distinctions of creed or nationality ever enter into its consideration for those who need relief. The orphan is provided for, the widow is comforted, and the sick one placed under good medical care and attendance. And all these acts are performed without any fund to depend upon—or to have recourse to—only the voluntary contributions of its members and the charitable public. In consequence of the low state of the treasury—in fact, the society is in debt—the members purpose giving a lecture on Friday evening next, at St. Mary's Cathedral, when it is hoped there will be an endorsement by the public of the good works they perform. Rev. Mr. Prendergast, President of the Diocesan College, Mission Dolores, will be the lecturer.

THE CALIFORNIA TEACHER.—We have received the November number of this valuable educational journal, which was accidentally omitted from our exchange list. The Teacher contains a noticeable article on "Juvenile Depravity and Public Schools," also an extract from the address of Dr. Bellows, delivered at the dedication of the Bush-street Grammar Schools.

SPRING.

(WRITTEN IN A LAWYER'S OFFICE.)

WHEREAS, on certain boughs and sprays,
Now divers birds are heard to sing,
And sundry flowers their heads upraiso,
Hail to the coming on of Spring.

The songs of those said birds arouso
The memory of our youthful hours,
As green as those said sprays and boughs,
As fresh and sweet as those said flowers.

The birds aforesaid—happy pairs—
Love 'mid the aforesaid boughs enshrines
In freehold nests: themselves, their heirs,
Administrators and assigns.

Oh, busiest term of Cupid's Court!
Where tender plaintiffs actions bring—
Season of frolic and of sport!
Hail, as aforesaid, the coming Spring!

THE GLACIERS OF OLD.

OUR geologists have, indeed, all accepted the idea that somewhere about the time when glaciers existed to an immense extent over the greater part of the world, icebergs floated in chill seas, and cast adrift their burdens of rocks and stones over what had been and were soon again to be the sunny meadows and green forestland of England. There are many reasons for believing, too, that the gravels which border so many of our rivers, such as the Thames, the Ouse, etc., were laid down under the influence of ice. The large stones and great blocks so often found in those gravels are far too big ever to have been carried down by the mere force of the river itself, even if we suppose them to have been far more rapid and turbulent than now. It is probable that the whole of the gravel was deposited by the means of ground ice, very much in the same way that some northern rivers are at the present day carrying down masses of gravel that they could hardly have moved had they been limpid streams. There are several other features, too, which suggest the idea of ice, and which, therefore, have led many geologists to suppose that these gravels were laid down at a time when the fiercer cold that had gloried in glaciers and icebergs was changing into our milder climate. What a terrible picture these facts open up to us, especially when we remember that all these things took place after the last geological stratum, so to speak, had been laid down, when the land had very nearly assumed its present surface. We see a land of genial, if not of tropical warmth, abounding in life, gradually clothed with snow, and mists, and ice. We see all its life fading away, as it sinks beneath the water, and the icebergs drift over it in a silence unbroken save by the voice of the sea and the noise of the grinding and splitting ice. We see the land rising again, but still clothed with ice, with the glaciers ploughing over it, and no sign of life save a few scattered arctic beasts on its wastes, and a few aretic shells on the shore. We still see, with returning warmth, the glaciers retreating up the hills, but the plains still often snow-clad and its rivers ice-bound, while an elephant and a rhinoceros, clad for warmth in wool, a reindeer, and other northern beasts, roam over it in search of a scanty livelihood. We see the land still warmer, so that a hardy hippopotamus can wallow in its rivers, and a bear and a hyena live in its caves, until the advent of other kinds, and of man himself, drives them out of the way. We see all these things, if any faith is to be placed in the meaning of stones laid on the earth, and of bones buried in the soil. But how came it to pass that such a season of ice—such a glacial epoch, as it is called—intervened between a former and a latter warmth? Did the earth, as it, together with the solar system, glides through the infinite regions of space, come into some colder spot? Or is the heat that the sun, our great source of warmth, gives out, not always constant, and was it then less than usual? Or did some varying arrangement of sea and land alternately chill and warm different parts of the globe, just as the Gulf Stream, by geographical circumstances, now gives our island a happy temperature above that of many places on the same parallel? Or was it brought about in some other way?—for all these hypotheses are choked with great difficulties. Very recently an attempt has been made to show what appears at first sight a paradox, that this ice-time was really due, not to cold, but to heat, and to connect it with the theory of the earth being a cooled mass of molten stuff with a lesseniug central fire.

AFTER DICKENS.—"Mercutio," dramatic critic of the New York Albion, in a review of a new dramatization of Martin Chuzzlewit, says: "Mr. Dickens, without being a quack, is to some extent, a false artist. He is not, indeed, to be condemned as an adherent of the butterfly creed. Nature has given him genius, and a large, warm heart, and a powerful intellect. But there is a taint in his art—a superficial defect, if you please, but not less a defect. Whether naturally or by design, he avails himself of emphasis. He exaggerates everything. It is only an under-tone of truth that lifts his novels above the level of mere caricature. Herein consists the inferiority of those novels as compared with the works of Thackeray. Yet Mr. Dickens himself tells us—in his touching "In memoriam" paper on the death of the great humorist—that he was wont, now and then, to lecture Thackeray for undervaluing the novelist's art: and he adds, with charming ingenuousness, that Thackeray used, thereupon, to thrust his hands in his hair, and stamp about the room, laughing, and refusing to argue the point. What other expedient was left to the perfect artist, when reproved by a writer who can scarcely describe a long nose without making it three feet in length?

"This element of exaggeration in the stories of Mr. Dickens has, however, in large degree, occasioned their popularity. Such personages as Quilp, Dick Swiveller, Sam Weller, Mrs. Nickleby, Mantallini, Micawber, Mrs. Gamp, Cuttle, Toots, Mrs. F.'s Aunt—and others—impress even the dullest imagination, by their utter extravagance, and linger in the memory as common eccentricities. There is a germ of nature in each, it is true; but that is rarely considered by the multitude of readers. The strength and beauty of the novelist's genius, revealed in delicate touches of thought, pathos, humor, and sentiment, are fully estimated only by the careful student of his works, whom exaggeration can neither blind nor mislead. His wide popularity, meanwhile, is due to his effective use of emphasis."

HOW SACRED CATTLE ARE TREATED.—Col. Campbell, in his Indian Journal, thus tells of the affectionate way in which the "mild Hindoo" treats his beast of burden: He worshipped that blessed animal. Before starting on the journey that caused its death, he consecrated his house by sprinkling its floors and door-posts with water in which a quantity of the animal's dung had been mixed; he concluded his morning devotion by smearing his breast and forehead with sacred ashes prepared from the same substance; und, thanking God that he is a good Hindoo, he lays upon the back of his half-starved bullock a load sufficient for a camel, and goes on his way rejoicing. He reaches the foot of the mountain-pass, and the over-laden bullock, already tottering with fatigue, commences his toilsome ascent. By dint of a vigorous application of the goad, the first mile is accomplished; but here the strength of the poor brute fails, and, sick and bleeding, it lies down to rest. The good Hindoo assails the object of his worship with kicks and curses, and by twisting its tail till the joints crack he succeeds in getting it once more upon its legs. Another half-mile is accomplished; but nature again fails, and again the overtasked brute sinks under its load. Kicks and blows are once more resorted to, and the tail is twisted with savage energy till each individual joint is dislocated or broken; the patient brute only replies with deep groans. The devout Hindoo is at his wit's end; and in the extremity of his wrath he even dares to curse the Brahmin bull that begat this unsainted bullock. He fumbles in his pouch and discovers a fresh chili. A gleam of hope lights up his swarthy features; he cuts the chili in two, and squeezes the pungent juice into the eyes of the fainting animal (this Col. Campbell says he has seen done.) The tortured brute, bellowing with pain, makes a last expiring effort; he regains his feet, staggers on another half-mile, and sinks to rise no more.

"It was his fate," remarks the self-satisfied Hindoo, as he leisurely unstraps the heavy burthen from the back of the dying brute, and distributes it among the other bullocks of the drove. And, satisfied that he has done his duty towards the sacred animal, because he refrains from cutting its throat, and leaves it to die a natural death, he proceeds on his journey, giving thanks to Vishnoo that he is not a slayer of oxen like the accursed Kaffirs, whose beards he defiles.

Perhaps, after all, the Hindoo might retort with an ugly question or two as to who it was that impressed or bribed him and his demigod into, possibly, an involuntary service.

STAND UP, SQUIRE.—Deacon N., an honest old codger, a kind neighbor and a good Christian, believed in the Presbyterian creed to the fullest extent; but, lackaday! the deacon would occasionally get exceedingly mellow, and almost every Sunday at dinner he would indulge in his favorite cider brandy to such an extent that it was with difficulty he reached his pew aisle, near the pulpit, and between the minister and the village squire. One Sunday morning the parson told his flock that he should preach a sermon touching many glaring sins so conspicuous among them, and he hoped they would listen attentively, and not flinch if he happened to be severe. The afternoon came, and the house was full; everybody turned out to see their neighbors "dressed down" by the minister, who, after well opening his sermon, commenced upon the transgressors with a loud voice, with the question, "Where is the drunkard?" A solemn pause succeeded the inquiry, when up rose Deacon N., his face red from the frequent draughts of his favorite drink, and steadying himself as well as he could by the pew rail, looked up and replied in a trembling, piping voice, "Here I am."

Of course a consternation in the congregation was the result of the honest deacon's response. However, the parson went on, commenting severely upon the drunkard, and closed by warning him to forsake at once such evil habits if he would hope for salvation and flee from the wrath to come. "And now," asked the preacher, in his loudest tones, "Where is the hypocrite?"

A pause, but no one responded. Eyes were turned upon this and that man, but the glances seemed to be chiefly directed to the squire's pew, and indeed the parson seemed to squint hard in that direction. The deacon saw where the shaft was aimed, or where it should be aimed, and rising once more, leaned over his pew to the squire, whom he tapped on the shoulder, and thus addressed him: "Come, squire, why don't you get up? I did when he called on me."

A SINKING STATE.—The most dangerous enemies of the soil of Florida are what its inhabitants call "Sinks." Those absorptions of the earth, though on a small scale, are, in fact, so numerous, that one may almost ask: "Is Florida slipping between the fingers of both Federals and Confederates?" and will she ultimately—like those high mountains of the Andes during the earthquake of Chile in 1646—vanish entirely from the surface of the earth? All over the country I found, when in that sinking State, sinks of all sizes, forms and ages. Some are slight, saucer-like depressions, others, still deeper, like basins, of from twenty to eighty yards across; or only uneven slopes and hollows, which would pass unnoticed were not one informed that the land just there had been "sinking" since such a time; or that an old inhabitant remembered a dead level where now there are various dells crowded with vegetation. Sometimes—and these are the most remarkable—the sinks are round and even, like wells, which, indeed, one might suppose them to be, so regular and perpendicular are their walls. Some of these are formed suddenly, during or after heavy rains, and are the result of one storm. They are sunk, perhaps, in an hour, in a night, without sign or warning; in the middle of the road, of a garden, or it may be a cattle pen. On one plantation I know of several such sinks. One is about thirty feet deep, and eight or nine across; another is twenty feet deep, and about four across the mouth. Sometimes it is not possible to distinguish the real bottom of the sink, for after the soil has been washed down to a certain distance, leaving a smooth regular hole, jagged rocks are laid bare, and the opening to a subterranean passage, it may be of vast length and depth, is exposed.—All the Year Round.

A LADY wished a seat. A portly, handsome gentleman brought one and seated the lady.

"Oh, you're a jewel!" said she.

"Oh, no," replied he, "I'm a jeweler; I have just set the jewel."

THE PEER AND THE PUGILIST.—An anecdote is told of the Honorable and Reverend Fitzroy Stanhope, which reflects credit on his head and heart, for by his tact and good humor he got his elder brother, when Lord Petersham, out of a serious family scrape. Their mother, the Countess of Harrington, was a most amiable lady, with perhaps too much stiffness of character for the youth of her day, and as she was the essence of propriety and refined manners, she naturally looked for those qualities in all her relatives, especially those nearest and dearest to her. Punctuality was also a great feature in her ladyship's character. Upon one occasion, when Lord Petersham had requested that breakfast might be on the table at an earlier hour than usual, the Countess was ready to do the honors, but her son was not present. In a few minutes the groom of the chambers informed his mistress that a gentleman had driven up to the door having an appointment with Lord Petersham. "Request the gentleman to walk in," said her ladyship; "he has probably come to breakfast, for I know his lordship is going a few miles out of town." The servant looked "taken aback," but, attentive to his orders, shortly returned, followed by the "gentleman," whose appearance and equipage had created no little sensation in the porter's hall. "What name shall I announce?" asked the servant. "Oh, a friend of Lord Petersham's, Mr. ——." Before the word was uttered the Countess came forward and apologized to the new-comer for the rudeness of her son in not being ready, adding that perhaps he would like some breakfast. "Thank you, my lady," responded the unknown, "I should like a little, for I have had a long drive this morning." The lady sat down, as did her guest, when the former tried to ascertain the calling of her visitor, who, she fancied, from his remarks, was connected in some humble capacity with the army, more especially when he alluded to the commissariat department. The equivoques that took place would furnish materials for a screaming farce; at length the Countess began to get impatient at the non-appearance of her son, and rang the bell. "What is the hour by St. James's Chapel?" (Harrington House was at that time in the Stable Yard, St. James's.) "Nine o'clock, my lady." At this piece of information the stranger rose abruptly from his chair, dropped the beautiful china cup and saucer from his hands, and exclaimed, "Then I'm blessed if we sha'n't be late for the fight, for it's to come off at half-past ten!" At this moment Lord Petersham, accompanied by the Hon. Fitzroy Stanhope, entered, and at once saw the state of things. The Countess had sat down to breakfast with Mr. William, commonly called "Bill Gibbons," the commissary-general of the P. C., or Pugilistic Club. Lord Petersham had hurried his friend away, leaving his brother to explain matters and to make all smooth. This he accomplished with so much tact, good humor and kindheartedness, that the Countess was soon appeased, and felt tenfold more delighted when, upon the return of her first-born, she heard from him that his first appearance at Monlsey Hurst would be his last. Lord Petersham was too refined a gentleman to take pleasure in pugilistic encounters, then so much patronized by the higher classes, and had only attended on the above occasion to see for himself what a fight really was.

FAILING EYESIGHT.—When the sight is beginning to fail, the eyes should be favored as much as possible. This can be done—1. By sitting in such a position as will allow the light to fall upon the page or sewing obliquely over the shoulder. 2. By not using the eyes for such purposes by any artificial light, or before sunrise or after sunset. 3. By avoiding the special use of the eyes in the morning before breakfast. 4. By resting them for half a moment or so while reading or sewing, or looking at small objects, by looking at things at a distance, or in the sky; relief is immediately felt in so doing. 5. Never pick any collected matter from the eyelashes or the corners of the eyes with the finger nails; rather moisten it with the saliva and rub it away with the nail of the finger. 6. Frequently pass the balls of the fingers over the closed eyelids toward the nose; this carries off any excess of water into the nose itself by means of the little canal which leads into the nostrils from each inner corner of the eye, which canal tends to close up, in consequence of the slightest inflammation, which attends weakness of the eye. 7. Keep the feet always dry and warm, so as to keep any excess of blood from the other end of the body. 8. Use eye-glasses at first, carried in the vest pocket, attached to a guard, for they are instantly adjusted to the eye with very little trouble; whereas, if common spectacles are used, such a process is required to get them ready, that to save trouble, the eyes are often strained to answer a purpose. 9. Wash the eyes abundantly every morning. If cold water be used, let it be flapped against the closed eye with the fingers of the right hand, not striking hard against the balls of the eye. But it would seem a better plan to open the eye in pure blood-warm water, because warm water is more penetrating than cold; it dissolves more rapidly and readily any hardened matter that may be about the lids, and is more soothing and more natural. 10. The moment the eyes feel tired, the very moment you are conscious of an effort to read or sew, lay aside the book or needle, and take a walk for an hour, or employ yourself in some active exercise not requiring the close use of the eyes.—Hall's Journal of Health.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF FAITH.—A Virginia circuit preacher gives the following illustration of "faith that would remove mountains," which he heard from the lips of a negro preacher, who was holding forth to his congregation upon the subject of obeying the commands of the Almighty:

"Bred'ren," he said, in his broken way, "whatever de good God tell me to do in dis blessed book," (holding up an old, and evidently much read Bible,) "dat I'm gwine to do. If I see in it dat I must jump troo a stone wall, I'm gwine to jump at it. Goin' troo it 'longs to GOD—jumpin' at it, 'longs to me."

Simple and homely as was the illustration, it had an evident effect upon the limited comprehension of the preacher's hearers.

NOTT'S COURTSHIP.

AWAY down East, in the State of Maine, Miss Amanda Mann was married to Mr. A. R. Nott, after a brief courtship, of which the following correspondence was the most original part:

NOTT TO AMANDA.

"Oh, that I could prevail, my fair, that we unite our lot!
Oh, take a man, Amanda Mann, and tie a 'double knot.'

"Your coldness drives me to despair—what shall I do? ah, what?
For you I'm growing thin and spare—for you I'm a 'pino Nott!'

"If I should hear that you had died, 'twould kill me on the spot—
Yet only yesterday I cried, 'Ah! would that she were Nott!'

"The chords and tendrils of my heart around thee fondly twine—
Amanda! heal this aching smart! Amanda, oh, be mine!

"These very terms, as I opine, suggest united lots—Lot's tie, then, dear, these cords and twine in hymeneal knots."

MISS AMANDA MANN'S REPLY.

"This life, we know, is but a span, hence I have been afraid
That I should still remain A Mann, and die at last—a maid.

"And often to myself I say, on looking round, I find
There's Nott, a man in every way just suited to my mind.

"I fain would whisper him apart, he'd make me bless'd for life—
If he would take me to his heart, and make A. Mann a wife.

"Love not, my mother often says; and so, too, says the song—
I'll heed the hint in future days, and love Nott well and long.

"Then, oh! let Hymen on the spot, his chain around me throw,
And bind me in a lasting knot, tied with a single beau."

A CHAMBER OF HORRORS.

FROM an account in an English magazine of a trip to a Swiss village called St. Gingo we extract the followiug descriptiou of "A Chamber of Horrors": "Not long after I took the chateau, an old servant who had lived there many years with its former tenant, a German Count, directed my attention to a wall of great thickness exteuding from the end of a small bed-room, about forty feet from the ground. According to him, the German nobleman had always slept in that chamber, which he allowed no one to enter, save iu his presence. On himself it appeared to produce a strange effect, since, according to the servants, he always shuddered on passing the doorway, while his countenance assumed a sadder expression than ordinary. Whether, had the opportunity been offered him, he would, before his death, have lifted the veil from the chamber's mystery, the old domestic could not say, for he died suddenly of apoplexy, without leaving behind him, in writing, any cluo to what had so long perplexed his dependants. When viewed from the court below, the ancient wall in a level with the chamber seemed to be built of large, loose stones, between the interstices of which swallows passed in and out. My curiosity being strongly excited, I went for a couple of workmen, and ordered them to make a perforation in the wall from the bed chamber; but on taking down the painted canvas with which it was covered, this proved to be altogether unnecessary, since behind it there was a small door, which, on being pushed, swung back on its hings. Before proceeding any farther I dismissed the workmen, and ordering a candle to be brought, for the chamber was pitch dark, entered alone. The air, close and heavy, was impregnated, as I thought, with the odor of decayed animal substauces, which immediately proved to be the case. Before me, on an antiqnated bed, lay the body of a woman, shrivelled to a mummy, dressed in the forgotten fashion of a former age, with rings on its fingers, a necklace about the neck, and long pins of gold thrust through the hair. All around the body the bed-clothes exhibited stains of blood. On one side of the bed I observed a dark coffer. worm-eaten, covered with dust, on lifting the lid of which, I saw the body of a man, with a poignard, which had probably passed through the heart, still stickiug in it. The clenched hands lay one by the side, the other across the breast. A slouching hat with a feather covered part of the face; the dress was gorgeous, and the boots, apparently not at all decayed, intimated that the corpse was that of a military man. I called in the butler, showed him the contents of the chamber, and then inquired the age of the German Count. 'He must,' the man replied, 'have been something over 80.' 'Is there no tradition among the peasants,' I asked, 'about the doings of the inmates of this chateau before your time?' 'It is only said,' he replied, 'that for some years there was great feasting and merriment, with a perpetual succession of guests, who hunted iu the neighborhood, sailed iu pleasure barges on the lake, made excursions among the Alps, and kept all the adjacent towns alive with their mirth and extravagance. On a sudden this ceased; the Count dismissed nearly all his domestics, retaining only my father and two other men, while, thenceforward, no woman was ever permitted to enter the chateau. There were no children, and the lady was reported to have returned to her relations in Germany.' 'To these facts,' I observed, 'we have the key now before us. There lies the Count's lady, and here the paramour for whose sake she was slain.'"

A CURIOUS STORY.—The Gazetta de Venezia is answerable for the following story: About a mile from Cavarzere the Marquis Platis has some land, part of which he wanted to turn iuto a rice-field. In order to get the necessary humidity for the soil enclosed, a stream of water was secured from the river Adige by means of a cylindrical syphon forty-five metres long with seven metres of ascensional elevation, and a diameter of forty centimetres. It worked well whenever required to do so, and such was exactly the case on the 5th of August, at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. I repeat the time because I find it stated in the official organ of Venice, which must have its Austrian reasons for being so very particular. Well, while the arched water-carrier was thus on duty, three boys were bathing in the river, when lo! one of them, Giovanni Boetio di Angela, twelve years old, a broad-shouldered lad, was seen to disappear suddenly. His fellow-urchins, (who were not otherwise described, from their being, I guess, too small to be sucked in by either the syphon or the Gazetta,) seeing him gone, began to cry and hallo most pitifully, when who should reappear upon the bank but Angela himself, singing cheerfully, the syphon having given him up all right on the rice-field.

MANNERS TO MEND.

THE age, there is no use in denying the fact, is a tame one; or at least to us, contrasting it with the last, it seems so. Chi va piano va sano is our motto. Voltaire told the world a hundred years ago that virtue had fled from the human heart and taken refuge on the lips. However this may be, it is certain that vice now-a-days wears a clean shirt, (often with malachite studs in it,) and is very particular about brushing its teeth and paring its nails. A wicked man blushes to wear his heart upon his sleeve. The profligate man in this era would be ashamed to be seen in the Haymarket. He shudders at the stories his elders tell about the "finish" and the saloons of the theatres. He would be unutterably shocked were he caught by the police in a back room in Jermyn street punting at chicken-hazard. Druukenness he scorns as a vice peculiar to the lower orders. Cool drinks and cigar-smoking, conducive as they are to slow sipping and deliberate emission of vapor rings, have quietly put an end to duelling. An insulted man chews the cud of his wrong, and takes a slow polite vengeance by genteelly defaming his enemy out-of-doors, or slandering his neighbor's wife, or buying up his bills, or criticising his works, You must not horsewhip a man now-a-days. He will have you up to Bow street, and you will be sent to jail. If you kick an insolent cad, you are considered little better than a garotter, and treated accordingly. You must uot post him as a liar or a coward. If you do, he will have the law of you, and you will be cast in heavy damages. If you wish to throw vitriol over anybody, or to exhibit aqua tofana to a few of whom you wish to be rid, you must fling your missile from rouud the corner, and administer your poison in private.

If a Colonel Charteris of our time were to be convicted at the Old Bailey of such a crime as that he was actually tried for, he would be as completely abandoned by his aristocratic acquaintances as the luckless William Roupell was lately repudiated by the politicians who sat by his side in the House of Commons and dined with him at the Pall-Mall clubs. He is not the "thing"—it is a "bad form" to recognize a man who has been found guilty by a jury of his countrymen. Yet dukes and marquises, and earls and baronets came forward to save Charteris from the rope he so richly deserved. He was a degraded, brutal sensualist; but he was a man of fashion, and enormously wealthy. Iu the present temper of society it is a matter of congratulation that neither his wealth nor his fashion would shield him from opprobrium and ostracism. I don't say that there are no Charterises at present; but they keep under cover. In the beginning of the present century the hackney-coachmen on the Piccadilly stand used to earn a handsome revenue by letting out the roof of their vehicles to amateurs, who, from those points of vantage, were able to take sly peeps at the orgies going on in the saloons of Queensberry House. "Old Q.," (the estimable Duke who used to wear raw beefsteaks in his nightcaps to induce a rosy complexion, and whose Tokay, at the sale after his death, fetched a hundred guineas a dozen,) did not care for concealment. En grand seigneur, he was as naughty as ever he chose, and made open parade of his naughtiness. He disdained even the demijeur of Venetian blinds. He was wicked in the broad daylight; and when the shades of evening came, set his state chambers all ablaze with light, that all London might be spectators of his scandalousness. But the existing generation would not tolerate "old Q." His goings-on would be voted mauvais-ton. When he flourished, the town only laughed at the disgraceful stories about him. Now they would shudder and turn pale. As with a Queensberry, so with a Lord Baltimore. Sir Charles Hanbury William's coarse verses would fail to make him a favorite in Pall-Mall. He would probably be expelled his club for ungentlemanly conduct. The spectacle of the Right Honorable Richard Brinsley Sheridan boozing over his bottle at Bellamy's, or reeling out of White's at three in the morning drunk, would not be regarded as a humorous spectacle. People would protest against the scandal created by such a "degraded creature." But it was not the fashion to be angry with such things in our grandmothers' days. If Mr. Pitt came tipsy iuto the house, or a fashionable countess compromised herself with the Prince Regent, or a marchioness was detected cheating at cards, the esclandre was deemed to have met with sufficient castigation if Mr. Gillray the caricaturist issned a colored etching on the event from Mrs. Humphrey's shop in St. James' street. Now that we are virtuous, and hide our heads behind the cupboard-door when we wish to indulge in cakes or ale, or are desirous that ginger should be hot in the mouth, Mr. Pitt's extra magnum, the countess' faux pas, and the marchioness' card-sharping, would be dilated upon in awfully indignant leaders in the penny papers. Go and look at Gillray's caricatures of "Wouski," of "Black Jack's delight," of "Faro's daughters," and you will see that dissipation the most flagrant and depravity the most invcterate were regarded in the good old times only as merry and convivial jests.—G. A. Sala.

ONE OF MR. SALA'S ANECDOTES.—"I remember a story of a certain comedian, by the name of Walsh, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. This gentleman never rose higher in his profession than to enact those useful but humble individuals in livery who announce the arrival of visitors to the principal personages in the drama One evening, a great tragedian being on the stage, it was Mr. Walsh's duty to come on, attired in plush, and say, 'My Lord, the coach is at the door.' This, being all that was laid down for him, he said: but, directly afterwards advancing to the footlights, and addressing the gallery, he continued with much animatiou, 'And allow me to add that the man who lifts his hand against a woman, save in the way of kindness, is unworthy the name of a Briton.' This sentiment brought down a tornado of applause, but on retiring from the stage the actor was pounced upon by the great tragedian and asked how he had dared to overstep the limits assigned to him. 'I'm very sorry,' quoth Mr. Walsh, 'but it's my benefit next Monday, and I've got to conciliate the audicuce, as well as you, Mr. Macready.'"

TWO STORIES FROM JULES JANIN.—M. Jules Janin, in a volume entitled Les Oiseaux Bleus, tells a good story of a general of the Capuchins who happened to enter Paris, on a mission from the Pope, on the same day that the King of France was expected in his capital, and mistook the ovation to the monarch for one to himself The streets were thronged, banners waved, bells rang, all was joy and festivity. "Ah!" murmured the good father at each step of his progress, "it is too great an honor for a poor soul like me!" As he advanced, the decorations grew more and more gorgeous — choice tapestry draped the houses, and a fountain of Burgundy played in the street, from which a Naiad filled him a foaming goblet. "Ah!" murmured the good father still, "what honor they pay me; what happiness!" At last he reached the Hotel de Ville, where the Court was stationed resplendent with diamonds and lace, and where the Archbishop of Paris was descried in full dress, surrounded by his clergy. Cries of "There he is! there he is!" burst from the assembled multitudes; the cannon roared, fireworks blazed, and, to crown all, an angel with flaming wings descended from a cloud, torch in hand, and lighted a fragrant bonfire of cedar and incense. "Ah!" cried the general of the Capuchins, "it is too much!" In an instant all became quiet; the pageant had vanished. The King had re-entered his palace at Versailles, the angel retired into his cloud, and the general of Capuchins entered the great Capuchin monastery, where he was secretly rather surprised to find that not a single Capuchin expected him. The pendant to this anecdote of priestly vanity is even better. Piron, the poet and wit, tired one day with a country ramble, sat down to rest on a bank of turf. Just as he was congratulating himself on his temporary escape from the fatigues of notoriety, and dilating rapturously ou the simple delights of the country, a farmer passed, and made him a profound bow. He had not sat long before a handsome peasant girl approached, and laid a bouquet of fresh hawthorn on the bank where he sat. Next, two well-known Parisian ladies passed, and, rising erect in their carriage, turned towards Piron, making the sign of the cross. Finally, a brilliant young colonel of the Royal Guard passed at the head of his troop, and, as they went by, the whole squadron presented arms. Overwhelmed by this last proof of the seemingly unusual homage to his genius, Piron rapturously declared that, after what had happened to him that day, nothing could hereafter astonish him. He was not, therefore, at all astonished to see a Knight of St. Louis, with white hair and naked head, and a brow seamed with scars, kneeling at his feet. But he rose abashed, and, with a bow, went his way. Had he looked behind, a cruel surprise awaited him, which is best conveyed in M. Janin's own language: "All these things had Piron seen with his own eyes. Only he had not seen, above the old beech-tree, in a natural niche which the rain and time had hollowed, an image of our Lady of Auteuil, a holy image brought from Rome as a present to his sister the Canoness by the Cardinal De Teucin, an image which worked miracles. Seated at the foot of this image, he had taken to himself all these acts of devotion."

MYSTERIES OF THE AIR.—Let a man roll a little air in his mouth, and what is that? Let Napoleon twist it between his lips, and the whole world is at war; give it to Fenelon, and he shall so manage it with his tongue that there shall be everywhere peace. It is but a little agitated air that sets mankind in motion. If we could live without air, we would not talk, or hear any sounds without it. There would be a blazing sun in a black sky—sunshine mingling with thick darkness, and there would be everywhere an awful silence. There is less air in the upper than in the lower regions of the atmosphere; the bottom crust of the air is, of course, densest. Saussure fired a pistol on the summit of Mont Blanc, and the report was like the snapping of a stick. There is a well at Fulda, three hundred palms deep; throw a stone down it, and the noise it makes in its defence will be like the firing off of a park of cannon. It goes down among the dense air, and it reverberates. When a man speaks, he strikes the air with his throat and mouth as the stone strikes water, and from his tongue, as from the stone, spread undulating circles with immense rapidity. Those circles may be checked and beaten back in their course, as it is with the waves of a sound made by a stone tumbling down a well, beaten back and furiously multiplied. At the caste of Simonotti, near Milan, one low note of music begets a concert; for the note is echoed to and fro by the great wings of the building that reflect and multiply a sound just as light is, and may be brought quite the same way to a focus.

A word spoken in the focus of one ellipse will be heard in the focus of an opposite ellipse hundreds of yards away. Such a principle was illustrated oddly in the great church of Agirigentum, in Sicily. The architect—perhaps intentionally—built several confessionals of an elliptical form, with corresponding opposite ellipses, in which, whoever stood, heard all the secrets whispered to the priest. A horrible amount of scandal sprung up in town; nobody's sins were safe from getting into unaccountable publicity. The church soon became such a temple of truth that nothing was left to be hidden in it; at last, by chance, a discovery was made of the tale-telling tones, and the walls had their ears stopped.

FORTY-NINE YEARS IN BED.—An English paper, the Doncaster Gazette, in announcing the death of William Sharpe, at Werlds, says that he went to bed in 1807, and never got out of it till he died there in 1856—a still life of forty-nine years, passed in a chamber scarcely nine feet square, the window of which had not been raised for the last thirty-eight years—and passed uninterruptedly in bed. When he was thirty he went one bright morning to the church to be married. His affianced came not—her father having an invincible repugnance to Mr. Sharpe as a son-in-law. The mortified groom went home, undressed, got into bed, pulled the blankets over his head and for forty-nine years obstinately refused to get up and clothe himself and go to work. It is remarkable that he was never at all seriously ill during this marvellously protracted incubation over his shame. He was sick for but a week before his death. His body was perfectly sound, in spite of his great age, and great abuse.

NOTES OF MINES AND MINERALOGY.

Extraction of Auriferous Silver out of Ores in the Liquid Way.—When ores contain alloys of gold and silver, the ordinary modes of extraction in the liquid way, give very unsatisfactory results, the yield being always too low. Even the hyposulphites, of which such excellent use is made in extracting silver, leave a considerable portion of the gold undissolved. It is found necessary to apply first Augustiu's or Ziervogel's methods to extract the silver, and then Plattner's method to obtain the gold, or the converse; but in every case both gold and silver remain in the residue, and it is necessary to repeat the operation or to concentrate the residue by smelting. The explanation of this is, that none of the solvents used hitherto are capable of dissolving simultaneously the gold and silver, and there is always formed on the surface of the alloy a film insoluble in the agent employed. For instance, if chlorine water be used, part of the gold is dissolved, but by the formation of insoluble chloride of silver, a limit to the action is soon reached, and if then the chloride of silver is dissolved in ammonia, common salt, or a hyposulphite, there is soon formed a coating of metallic gold, which protects from action the interior parts of the alloy. The agent proposed for overcoming these difficulties is simply a concentrated solution of common salt saturated with chlorine. The ore is simply roasted and lixiavated with this solvent, which takes out all the gold and silver.

Glaciers and Gold in Nova Scotia.—In a report made to the New York and Nova Scotia Gold Mining Company, Prof. B. Silliman, Jr., after describiug the geological character of the country, makes some interesting remarks on this subject, which we briefly extract: "Over very considerable areas the glacial scouring has been so thorough that nothing whatever is left on the rocks but the grooves and striæ which accompany their polish. For a great part of the whole coast the glacial scratches, or the course of the glacial drift, has been almost at right angles to the strike of the rocks. These facts bear in a most important manuer, it will be seen, upon the occurrence of alluvial gold. If we cousider for a moment the physical and geological featnres just described, it at once becomes evident that the great mass of loose materials which came from the scouring off of the country by glacial action, has gone into the Atlantic oeean, where the gold is safely deposited. Sable Island, which, by Mr. Kingley's map, is distant about one hundred miles from the shore, is a sand-spit, thirty miles long by about half a mile wide, shaped like a bow, and consists entirely of an accumulation of loose white sands. Mr. Campbell, the provincial geologist, informs me that he washed gold from those sands in 1857, and that it was in very small, highly-polished scales, like the fine gold of California."

Mining by Machinery.—Great as has been the progress made in late years in machinery for reducing and treating gold and silver ores, it is only very recently that attention has been given to the working of the mines themselves, by mechanical means. It is at this point of mining that the heavy cost and labor are expended, vastly more than on the ores after they are out. To work the ores is comparatively an easy matter; to prepare the mine, protect it properly and extract the ores, is to the miner an exhaustive toil, to the proprietors often a ruinous expense.

The great interest taken in this matter is shown by the constant discussious of it in the scientific journals, both at home and abroad, by the various inventions lately issned for coal cutting by machinery, the ventilating and timbering of mines, etc., and by the repeated requests for information and descriptions of the means used by the Italian and French engineers for boring and excavating the Mount Cenis tunnel, designed to connect France and Italy by railway. Of all the work the miner has to perform in the mines, the slowest. most costly and laborious is the boring by hand-labor the holes for blasting. Many machines have been devised to do this work, some of great ingenuity, but all, for one cause or another, have in practice been found deficient. There is reason to believe that the difficulties which seemed inherent and insurmountable in machines of this kind have at last been overcome. Among the many useful and clever inventions on view at the Exhibition of the Royal Polytechnic Institution of Cornwall, was the boring machine of Mr. Edward Crease. The inventor has spent some six years in bringing the machine to its present state of perfection, and it is a sufficient proof of its practical value that the judges, after having fully tested its various movements, awarded it a prize medal. It was exhibited under the auspices of the Miner's Association of Cornwall and Devon, and the advantages claimed for it, are its simplicity of construction, the mathematical precision of its movements, and the facility and economy of its working.

Underground operations have hitherto been conducted on the same slow and unchanged system that have been in use since the invention of gunpowder, and it is estimated that the same price is paid and the same time occupied for opening a yard of ground as, with suitable machinery, would be requisite for double or treble the quantity. With good excavating machinery there would be no fear of mining adventurcs being abandoned in despair, after years of anxiety and outlay; nor of miners exhausting one discovery before making another; nor of paying double the valuo for the ore raised—the consequence being that many mines, now languishing, would be paying large profits. The machine of Mr. Crease is described as a pillar fixed to a stand on wheels, intended for a tramroad, and by means of a screw on the top of the pillar it can be screwed to the back of the level, and made as firm as the surrounding rock. On this pillar is a socket, which, with the assistanee of a rack and pinion, can be raised or depressed at pleasure; attached to this socket is another, through which a ronnd hollow bar passes, on the end of which is the machine, (three feet long only,) which works on a slide by means of a screw attached to the self-acting motion. The machine itself is attached to the bar by a swivel-joint, and has a universal motion, to enable it to bore a hole at any angle and in any position it is possible to bore by hand; indeed so thoroughly to command the ground as to enable the operator to take every advantage of the cleavage, so that when the holes are blasted the utmost possible amount of rock should be dislodged. The power required is very small, only a pressure of from fifteen to twenty lbs. per inch—a pressure so small that the power consumed is almost inappreciable when attached to any motive power that may exist on the mine. In the trials made, when worked only with half its estimated power, it bored holes through exceedingly hard granite at the rate of ono inch per minute, and there appears no reason why the speed could not be trebled. Its weight is under fifteen cwt., and no doubt is entertained, by the gentlemen before whom it was exhibited and tested, of its speedy and univeral adoption.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

At Maguire's Opera House on Saturday night a large audience witnessed the second representation of Hamlet by Mr. Charles Kean. Beside the merit of Mr. Kean's conception of the character, we must give him the credit of overcoming, to a considerable degree, not only the disadvantages of personating the appearance of youth, but many of the mental qualities that are peculiar to it. The morbid fancies of Hamlet essentially belonged to the poetic era of his life, and would naturally seek interpretation through more youthful voice and action. We were somewhat astonished that such a careful and conscientious reader of Shakspearc, as Mr. Kean evidently appears to be, should have omitted a part of the actiou iu the platform scene on that eveuing. When Hamlet swears his two friends to secrecy and the ghost repeats the adjuration, Mr. Kean and his fellow actors tacitly accepted the phenomena as supernatural. In the text, "Hamlet," still watchful of his secret, and nervously anxious to throw a doubt on the actual existence of the ghost, eudeavors to give the occurrence a natural and material coloring, and speaks jestingly of the spirit as that "old fellow in the cellarage" who "consents to swear," and so moves to another part of the platform, where the adjurations and the explanation are repeated, with Hamlet's simulated wonder that "the old mole" could move "i' the earth so fast." The words, the action and the motive were omitted, which, in a measure, form an explanatory context to Hamlet's singular conduct to his friends after his ghostly interview. Mr. Mayo's ghost—a capital make up—was a trifle too monotonous and passionless; if the buried majesty of Denmark were impelled by a sentiment of revenge to get up in the middle of the night, when the air bit "shrewdly," he might reasonably have displayed some slight acerbity of voice and have exhibited some pardonable indignation. Mayo's idea of a sepulchral voice—disembodied—incorporato as the thin air, was very good, and yet need not have precluded the passion suggested above. The "Laertes" of Cathcart was well done. "Horatio" was worthy of Hamlet's friendship. Mr. Anderson should have made "Polonius" a triflo moro intelligent—the old courtier was the Machiavelli of the Danish Court, and, with the exceptiou of the Grave-digger, the only man of practical sound sense in the kingdom. In regard to the impractical character of the personages in this play an ingenious commentary might be written, suggested by the remark of Hamlet about the teudency of the Danish character to driuk, and wassail, and thus explain a good many inconsistencies which occur in the hero's character, and which might bo pardoned if we were satisfied that Hamlet, to speak profanely, "pressed his Rosenbaum" too freely. The "Ophelia" of Miss Chapman was rendered very acceptable by the tender and pathetic melody of her voice in the ballads. Mrs. Kean's "Queen Gertrude" was a finished performance—perhaps her most capital hit was her quiek rejection of any sympathy with the fietitions Queen in the poisoning scene of the players, aud her assertion, "The lady doth protest too much."

Macbeth was played on Monday night for tho first time; but our limited space will not allow an extended notice; it is to bc repeated this evening. King John, The Merchant of Venice, and Much Ado About Nothing, whose priucipal character, "Rosalind," was one of Mrs. Kean's favorite persouations, occupied the rest of the week.

A grand complimentary benefit to Mr. Thomas Maguire will be tendered to him by Mr. and Mrs. Kean and the entire Opera House company on Monday night next, and it will be the theatrieal event of the coming week. Mr. Maguire has held the managerial reins in this city for over fourteen years, commencing with the old Jenny Lind theatre, now the City Hall, where stars of a different order from those who now congregate there, trod the boards. Nearly all the talent who have visited California, from the period of the elder Booth's advent to the preseut reign of the Keau's, came through the encouragement and under engagement to Mr. Maguire. Mr. Maguire is now manager of three theatres in this city, and sole proprietor of two of them.

Miss Jenny Kempton's benefit, on Saturday evening last was a very handsome tribute to her talents as an artiste. Tho operatic event of the week, however, was the farewell benefit of Miss Caroline Richings, who, accompanied by her father, left the shores of the Pacific on the 3d instant. The house was literally crowded from pit to dome on Tuesday evening, when this popular and talented artiste trod those familiar boards for perhaps the last time, received the final bouquet, and sank responsive iu the graceful courtesy that proved to be her congé. Sho has left behind not only a large circle of admirers of her professional abilities, but many who esteemed her for those pleasant attributes which, underlying her artistic abilities, gave her a social pre-eminence more enduring thau even her lyric reputation. We trust she will visit us again at a period not so distant but that her father may be able, in spite of his advanced years, to accompany her and meet his San Francisco friends as heartily and as courteously as he was wont.

The Eureka has produced its "comic opera" novelty, entitled "The Runaway Husband," in which Coes personates the Runaway; Lewis, his wife; Birch, a whitewasher; and Backus, Sarah Ann. The piece is a success. And the public need never fear a disappointment by its postponement during the run in consequence of the indisposition of Birch the tenor, or Backus the prima-donna; for they are robust artists and are not subject to such inconvenient drawbacks. No nightly strains upon their voices and their constitutions, will ever break up the one or break down the other. Backus has been giving what may be justly called photographic representations of leading actors, so strikingly true are they in manner, voice and gesture to the originals, and he has made a sensation thereby. His imitations of Kean, Stark, Forrest, Buchanan, and others, are palpable hits. Tho Eureka gives entertainments every Saturday afternoon for ladies and children, which aro very popular and very cosy affairs.

Platt's Hall is to be changed into a Hippotheatron! Startling as the announeement may be, it is a fact. Manager John Wilson has secured the Hall for a few nights, and intends to inangurate a season with a troupe of accomplished equestrians with Zoyara at their head, which shall surpass anything he has hitherto produced in the way of arenic talent. The Hall will thoroughly protect the audience from all exposure to the weather incidental to the season, and will offer every convenience for the enjoyment of the spirited performances that will greet their attendance there. The circle is to be constructed in the manner of similar institutions in European capitals, with spring cushions, covered with velvet carpeting in the centre, and with matting protectors for the horses' orbit of it. The sides are to be protected by combination elastic cushions, which will save the daring vaulters, from all accidents, although they may be expected to carom occasionally iu their re-bounds—but there will be no "scratches."

What's in a Name.—Years ago, when as yet the pomps and vanities of the world had not invaded the churches, Father Ostrander was presiding elder among the Methodists in this region. To his horror, one Sabbath, as he was reading the hymn, he heard the twang of a musical instrument in the choir, and, pausing, he demanded,

"What's that you've got up there in the choir?"

"A bass viol, sir," meekly replied the leader.

"I say it isn't," said the indignant elder; "it's a great ungodly fiddle. Take it away!"

They took it away.

VALUE OF HEALTH.—Upwards of thirty years since, Dr. BENJAMIN BRANDRETH introduced to the community a vegetable pill which has since become the household medicine of tens of thousands of families in the United States, and throughout the countries of Europo and South America. When first brought to the notice of the public, few could be persuaded of its virtues. Gradually, at first, it was tried, and then, as case after case of recovery from many diseases reached the ears of the public, its value increased in what might be called geometrical proportions. Medical men, who had seen patients recover rapidly by the use of BRANDRETH'S pills who had for indefinite periods of time been under their charge without showing signs of improvement, began to despair, believing that the great secret of life and health had been discovered, and their occupation was gone from them. Some, more enterprising than their fellows, at once adopted into their practice the great conservator of health, and their success corresponded with their liberality. Since then, the Brandrethian system has been in the ascendant.

It is said that no habit has spread throughout the world so rapidly as the use of tobacco. This is a mistake. It has taken two hundred years to make the nicotine plant known to the nations, while in less than a quarter of a century the Brandreth Pill, as a purifier of the stomach and bowels, and as a preventive of every fever known, no matter by what term called or from what cause originated, has become the indispensable necessity of every peoplo on the globe, civilized and barbarous.

It may ho asked, why is this preparation so eminent over others? We answer, because, above every other, it does its work directly.

It cleanses the system thoroughly of every impurity, and restores the blood to its pristine condition. Dr. Brandreth holds, and his conclusions are based on physiological as well as Biblical fact, that all diseases originate in the blood, and that a medicino which seizes upon and purifies it, places the body that contains it beyond the possibility of abnormal action. It is not necessary to attempt to vindicate a theory so self-evident. We know that a fountain cannot send forth at the same time sweet water and bitter; and we also know that we cannot look for health where the fountain of health is corrupted. Purify the blood system, and life, strength, youth, and absence from disease are assured. These, the Brandreth Pill not only promises, but gives. Let those who would go through existence without sickness or even momentary pain, remember that the preventive from every ill lies in the vegetable preparation whose active and passive virtues no sane man will dispute, known as the Brandreth Medicino.

It is hardly necessary to state that Dr. B. continues his unremitting care in the manufacturing department of the Brandreth Pills; or that they are entirely free from chemical or mineral preparations; these facts being well known and understood to he so. While mercury and bleeding, and other deleterious remedies are becoming more and more unpopular, the Brandreth Pills are extending the sphere of their usefulness by the appreciation of a generous and discerning public.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute; and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case he incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electropathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathise with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required!

All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made na inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?

PUNCH SONG.

FOUR elements, joined in
An emulous strife,
Build up the world, and Constitute life.

First from the citron
The starry juice pour;
Acid to Life is
The innermost core.

Now, let the sugar
The bitter one meet;
And the strength of the acid
Be tamed with the sweet.

Bright let the water
Flow into the bowl;
For water, in calmness,
Encircles the whole.

Next, shed the drops
Of the spirit within;
Life but its life from
The spirit can win.

Drain quick—no restoring
When cool can it bring;
The wave has but virtue
Drunk hot from the spring!—[Schiller.

SOMETHING MORE ABOUT POMPEII.

ONE of the most interesting discoveries recorded in the journals was made on the 12th December, 1772. For some weeks workmen had been employed in clearing out the ruins of a house of considerable size, evidently the residence of a man of wealth, outside the gate leading to Herculaneum. After exploring many rooms, containing various objects of value, they came to what appeared to be a long subterranean passage. Here encased in the hardened mud they found a group of skeletons, consisting of eighteen full-grown persons, mostly women, a boy, and a very young child. It is conjectured that these were the remains of the family of the owner of the house, who is supposed, without sufficient grounds, to have been a certain Diomedes, from a tomb inscribed with that name discovered in the street hard by.

These victims of the eruption had sought refuge in a vaulted corridor, forming a square, which, from the number of wine-jars found in it, is supposed to have been a wine-cellar. They had hoped that the strong stone vault would have protected them against the shower of pumice-stones and ashes, and the falling masses which first issued from the black cloud that covered the heavens, and which they vainly believed would last but for a little time. They were not, however, beyond the reach of the insidious mud, which, entering by the small windows and oozing through every opening, gradually gathered round them. There was no means of flight. The entrance was closed against them by the accumulating "lapillo." Huddled into a corner, and nestled in each other's arms, they were, little by little, covered by the rising mud. We may hope that they were not exposed to a lingering death, but that, overcome by the sulphurous fumes, they were soon lost to consciousness.

The mud rapidly hardened round the bodies, and preserved almost a perfect mould of the unhappy victims as they had clung together in the last agony of death—a more touching group than ever sculptor has invented. The flesh and all the more delicate parts of the human frame had long perished; but the bones were left in the hollow mould which the limbs had formed. In some instances the hair was still attached to the skulls; and it was noted that a young girl had her long tresses twisted in elaborate plaits. The clothes they wore had been carbonized; but there were remains of them, which, with the impression they had left on the mud, served to show their texture, and to prove that of those who perished some were clothed in much coarser garments than others. The superintendent, who was present at the discovery, was even able to ascertain that most of the women wore over their heads linen drapery, which fell to their shoulders; that their dresses consisted, in most cases, of several gowns, as it were, one over the other; that their lower limbs were clothed in linen or cloth trousers, "cut in the form of long drawers;" and that whilst some wore shoes or sandals, the feet of others had been naked. One lady was distinguished by the richness of her jewelled ornaments and the fineness of her linen. The whole story was thus told: the servants and dependents of the family had died in the same struggle with their master and mistress.

Fragments of the singular casts we have described were cut from the surrounding soil. The perfect mould of the bosom of a girl, of exquisite form, with the thin drapery which partly covered it, has long been one of the most interesting objects in the Naples museum. It has now almost crumbled away. Unfortunately the happy idea which afterwards occurred to Signor Fiorelli, and to which we shall hereafter allude, had not suggested itself to those who then had the direction of the excavations.

Many ornaments in gold and silver, such as armlets, bracelets, necklaces, and finger-rings, a few engraved gems, twenty-eight coins, chiefly of Vespasian and Sergius Galba, bronze candelabra and vases, parts of a casket—probably the jewel-case of the lady of the house—a bunch of keys, a wooden comb, a piece of coral, and some other objects, were discovered near this group.

The excavations at present carried on are mostly confined to a part of the town which seems to have been inhabited by the poorer classes. The ground-floor of the houses consists of mean shops, with an outer room entirely open to the street, and an inner, small and dark, in which the stores were probably kept.

These humble dwellings are, however, by no means devoid of interest. They afford us a curious insight into the manners and mode of life of the inhabitants of Pompeii. Many trades and crafts still well known to us were carried on in them. Some have their appropriate sign, such as we see over modern shops. A kind of eating-house was recently discovered. In the front room was the usual slab of white marble, upon which the smoking meats and probably the stewed gourds, and such like delicacies, were exposed, as in Naples at this day. On it stood an earthen pipkin containing small fish, which had apparently been cooked in oil with raisins, and had been ready to serve up when the sudden cloud gathered over the town. Let into a kind of brick dresser were deep basins of earthenware and metal, beneath which were small, open fire-places to keep the soup and other messes warm. Upon it were lying the ladles which had been used to distribute the contents of the vessels. A rude iron tripod stood upon the floor, supporting an iron pot or kettle for boiling water, and in the middle of the room was a portable iron cooking stove, such as Soyer himself might have envied. Ranged against the walls were a number of deep bronze trays of various sizes, fitting one into the other. Such trays are still used in the East to serve up a meal. A few glass wine-jars were scattered over the floor, and one or two square panes of real window-glass, showing that the Romans were not ignorant of what, until recently, antiquarians declared to be a modern invention. In the inner shop half-a-dozen earthen jars or amphoræ of various sizes stood upright against the wall. They had contained select wines, for which, no doubt, the host enjoyed a local reputation. Each bore its mark, and the name of the wine it held; some the year of the vintage fixed by the consular date. Thus, on one amphora we read "FRVT. T. CLAVDIO. III. L. VITELLIO. III. COS." The contents were consequently thirty-two years old when the town was overwhelmed, having been "bottled" in the fourth year of the consulate of Tiberius Claudius and the third of Lucius Vitellius, or A. D. 47. One wine from the island of the Cos, is called "COVM. GRANATVM." The epithet "granatum" is supposed by Signor Fiorelli to indicate some peculiar flavor which was specially esteemed. It is noted that it was bought from the cellar of Alerius Felix at Rome—no doubt a celebrated wine-merchant "of the period." Another jar is marked "KOR. OPT."—the very best Coreyra; the island was well known for the produce of its grapes. One contained a wine which was evidently considered as very choice: it is called "Old Luna," and we are informed that was bought by one Cornelia out of the cellar of M. Valerius Ainnerieus (a very Eastern-sounding name—perhaps he was a Jew,) and had been kept four years in bottle:

LVN. VET
AIIIIR
KIIIIS

CORNELIA

M. VALERI. ABERNINICI.

The letter K may indicate that it was red. The number preceding the letter S may mark the price paid for it, or the measure of the amphora. At the bottom of this inner room was a baking-oven. The mouth was still closed by an iron plate. On the floor beneath lay the iron shovel with which the loaves had been placed in the oven, and with which they were to be taken out when fit for use. When the iron door was removed it was found that it had so completely closed the entrance that neither ashes nor mud had entered the oven, which was as it had been left by the baker after he had placed his loaves in it for baking eighteen hundred years ago. Within were the loaves themselves, eighty-three in number, black and charred, but still retaining their shape, that of a modern double loaf scored on the top. Scattered about the room were found olives, onions, beans, nuts, and the bones of fish. Near the oven were other bronze trays, and various vessels in metal were on the floor. Two large leaden tubs in a corner of the room had probably been used for slops and refuse. Squalid cook's shops, not unlike that discovered at Pompeii, are to be seen in many a back street of modern Naples.

MATERNAL INSTINCT.—One day—so goes this popular tradition—as Sir Alexander Murray was strolling down the avenue he saw the Laird of Haystoun, mounted on his white pony, approaching, as if with the intention of visiting Darn Hall. After the usual greetings, Murray asked Haystoun if that was his intention.

"Deed, it's just that," quoth Haystoun, "and I'll tell you my errand. I'm goin' to court your daughter Jean."

The Laird of Blackbarony (who, for a reason that will afterwards appear, was not willing that his neighbor should pay his visit at that particular time,) gave the thing the go-by by saying his daughter was "ower young for the laird."

"E'en's you like," quoth Haystoun, who was somewhat dorty, and who thereupon took an unceremonious leave of Blackbarony, hinting that his visit would perhaps be more acceptable somewhere else.

Blackbarony went home and immediately told his wife what had passed. Her ladyship on a moment's reflection, seeing the advantage that was likely to be lost in the establishment of her daughter, and to whom the disparity in years was no objection, immediately exclaimed:

"Are you daft, laird? Gang awa', immediately, and call Haystoun back again."

On this, the laird observed, (and this turned out the cogent reason for his having declined Haystoun's visit,) "Ye ken, my dear, Jean's shoon's at the mending." (For the misses of those days had but one pair, and these good substantial ones, which would make a strange figure in a drawing-room of the present day.) "Ye ken, Jean's shoon's at the mending."

"Hoot awa, sic nonsense," says her ladyship; "I'll gie her mine."

"And what will you do yoursel?"

"Do?" says the lady; "I'll put on your boots; I've lang petticoats, and they will never be noticed. Rin and cry back the laird."

Blackbarony was at once convinced by the reasoning and ingenuity of his wife; and as Haystoun's pony was none of the fleetest, Blackbarony had little difficulty in overtaking him and persuading him to return again. The laird having really conceived an affection for his neighbor's daughter, the visit was paid. Jean was introduced in her mother's shoes; the boots were never noticed; and the wedding took place in due time, and was celebrated with all the mirth and jollity usually displayed on such occasions. The union turned out happily, and from it, as has been said, sprung the present family of Haystoun.—Chambers' "History of Peeblesshire."

EXTRAORDINARY WEAKNESS.—The extremest case of human weakness on record is that of the poet and wit, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes who was prevented from delivering a lecture on account of illness, and wrote to the committee a letter of apology, in which he says, "I am satisfied that if I were offered a fifty-dollar bill after my lecture, I should not have strength enough left to refuse it."

A MISTAKE SOMEWHERE.—A lady at Columbus, Ohio, inquired of the spirit-rappers how many children she had.

"Four," rapped the spirit.

The husband, startled at the accuracy of the reply, stepped up and inquired,

"How many children have I?"

"Two!" answered the rapping medium.

The husband and wife looked at each other, with an odd smile on their faces, for a moment, and then retired non-believers. There had been a mistake made somewhere.

NEIGHBORLY CORRESPONDENCE.—"Mr. Thompson presents his compliments to Mr. Simpson, and begs to request that he will keep his piggs from trespassing on his grounds."

"Mr. Simpson presents his compliments to Mr. Thompson, and begs to suggest that, in future, he will not spell pigs with two gees."

"Mr. Thompson's respects to Mr. Simpson, and will feel obliged if he will add the letter E to the last word in the note just received, so as to represent Mr. Simpson and lady."

"Mr. Simpson returns Mr. Thompson's note unopened, the the impertinence it contains being only equaled by its vulgarity."

ART CRITICISM.—The subjoined strikes us as an exeellent "take-off" of a style of art-criticism which is quite too common: "'Picture of a Peasant-Girl Stirring the Fire.' A rare specimen of rural simplicity. The figure is remarkably graceful, but the poker is perhaps rather too stiff. A curvilinear delineation from a right line toward the line of beauty would have given to this useful kitchen utensil a much more picturesque effect. Domeniehino, Salvator Rosa, and Michael Angelo would have avoided this defect. The chiaroscuro of the tongs, in subdued shadow, is a wonderful effort of art. The shovel, on the contrary, lacks depth and buoyancy."

THE WIDOW LAMBKIN.—It was winter, clear and cold, and the snow was finely packed, when Dr. Meadows was one of a sleighing party, which he describes, so far as he and the young Widow Lambkin were concerned, in the words following: "The lively Widow Lambkin sat in the same sleigh, under the same buffalo-robe with me.

"'Oh, oh! don't! don't!' she exclaimed, as we came to the first bridge, at the same time catching me by the arm, and turning her veiled face toward me, while her little eyes twinkled through the moonlight.

"'Don't what?' I asked. 'I'm not doing anything.'

"'Well, but I thought you were going to take toll,' replied Mrs. Lambkin.

"'Toll!' I rejoined. 'What's that?'

"'Well, I declare!' cried the widow, her clear laugh ringing out above the music of the bells, 'you pretend you don't know what toll is!'

"'Indeed I don't, then,' I said, laughing: 'pray explain, if you please.'

"'You never heard, then,' said the widow, most provokingly—'you never heard that when we are on a sleigh-ride the gentlemen always—that is, sometimes—when they cross a bridge, claim a kiss, and call it toll. But I never pay it.'

"I said that I had never heard of it before; but when we came to the next bridge I claimed the toll, and the widow's struggles to hold the veil over her face were not enough to tear it. At last the veil was removed, her round, rosy face was turned directly toward mine, and in the clear light of a frosty moon the toll was taken, for the first time in his life, by Dr. Meadows. Soon we came to a long bridge, with several arches; the widow said it was no use to resist a man who would have his own way, so she paid the toll without a murmur.

"'But you won't take toll for every arch, will you, doctor?' the widow said so archly that I could not fail to exact all my dues, and that was the beginning—"

But never mind the rest. The Lambkin had the Meadows all to herself in the spring.

A LESSON TO PRACTICAL JOKERS.—There is a great propensity sometimes, among very clever persons, to make their acquaintances the victims of practical jokes. The serious evils that have resulted from this thoughtlessness would, if enumerated, form a melancholy chapter. Some years ago, a young officer at a frontier garrison was continually amusing himself with victims to this false wit, and, although frequently getting himself into difficulty, yet he persevered. Some of the "shrewd heads" prophesied that the young gentleman, when he least expected it, would get himself into a serious scrape, and it happened sooner than was anticipated. Old Major Straightback was a paymaster and "nothing else." All military enthusiasm with him had been long ago absorbed in the business of dollars and cents. He took the Government money from post to post, paid it out, and took receipts, with a gravity that was chilling to behold. Yet, as he carried the purse, his arrival on "pay-day" was hailed by officers, sutlers, and men. Late one evening old Major Straightback arrived in camp, and while sitting round the social fire, our jocular young friend concluded that the Major, from his peculiarities, would be a fine subject for a practical joke, and possessed with this idea, he quietly abstracted the Major's pocket-book, and, disposing of it about his own person, waited patiently for the denouement. The small talk having been "done up," the Major was about starting for his quarters, when he missed his "sub-treasury." Alarmed for the moment, lest he had compromised himself by some carelessness, he exhibited such painful solicitude that the young man handed over the "treasure," with the remark that he only "took it for a joke." The reaction of the Major's mind from alarm to intense indignation was immense; but, controlling his feelings, he quietly opened the pocket-book, and solemnly commenced counting its contents. Having gone through with this pantomime, he turned to the now horror-stricken practical joker, and said, "Young man, there are some five hundred dollars less in this pocket-book than there was—" And stopping a moment at the conclusion of this equivocal remark, he concluded, "If I ever hear of your playing a practical joke on any one again, you will please pay up the amount." It is almost unnecessary to add that the victim of so severe yet merited a lesson thereafter avoided the folly of committing practical jokes.

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF
Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, renderiug the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her masking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

Remember the number, 629 Mission street, San Francisco. jy30tf*

QUINTESSENCE OF

ENGLISH GARDEN LAVENDER FLOWERS,

Prepared from ingredients imported expressly for the purpose by

H. P. WAKELEE, Druggist,

Montgomery street, cor. Sutter, San Francisco.

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the United States. When pure and distilled from the flowers, it is the most delicate and refreshing perfumes in use. This preparation is recommended as the pure essence of Garden Lavender Flowers. se24

THE KILLING OF JULIUS CÆSAR "LOCALIZED."

[BEING THE ONLY TRUE AND RELIABLE ACCOUNT EVER PUBLISHED, AND TAKEN FROM THE ROMAN "DAILY EVENING FASCES," OF THE DATE OF THAT TREMENDOUS OCCURRENCE.

NOTHING in the world affords a newspaper reporter so much satisfaction as gathering up the details of a bloody and mysterious murder, and writing them up with aggravated circumstantiality. He takes a living delight in this labor of love—for such it is to him—especially if he knows that all the other papers have gone to press and his will be the only one that will contain the dreadful intelligence. A feeling of regret has often come over me that I was not reporting in Rome when Cæsar was killed—reporting on an evening paper and the only one in the city, and getting at least twelve hours ahead of the morning paper boys with this most magnificent "item" that ever fell to the lot of the craft. Other events have happened as startling as this, but none that possessed so peculiarly all the characteristics of the favorite "item" of the present day, magnified into grandeur and sublimity by the high rank, fame, and social and political standing of the actors in it. In imagination I have seen myself skirmishing around old Rome, button-holing soldiers, senators and citizens by turns, and transferring "all the particulars" from them to my note-book; and, better still, arriving "at the base of Pompey's statue" in time to say persuasively to the dying Cæsar: "O, come now, you ain't so far gone, you know, but what you could stir yourself up a little and tell a fellow just how this thing happened, if you was a mind to, couldn't you—now do!" and get the "straight of it" from his own lips. And be envied by the morning paper hounds!

Ah! if I had lived in those days I would have written up that item gloatingly, and spiced it with a little moralizing here and plenty of blood there; and some dark, shuddering mystery; and praise and pity for some, and misrepresentation and abuse for others, (who didn't patronize the paper,) and gory gashes, and notes of warning as to the tendency of the times, and extravagant descriptions of the excitement in the Senate-house and the street, and all that sort of thing.

However, as I was not permitted to report Cæsar's assassination in the regular way, it has at least afforded me rare satisfaction to translate the following able account of it from the original Latin of the Roman Daily Evening Fasces of that date—second edition:

Our usually quiet city of Rome was thrown into a state of wild excitement, yesterday, by the occurrence of one of those bloody affrays which sicken the heart and fill the soul with fear, while they inspire all thinking men with forebodings for the future of a city where human life is held so cheaply, and the gravest laws are so openly set at defiance. As the result of that affray, it is our painful duty, as public journalists, to record the death of one of our most esteemed citizens—a man whose name is known wherever this paper circulates, and whose fame it has been our pleasure and our privilege to extend, and also to protect from the tongue of slander and falsehood, to the best of our poor ability. We refer to M.r J. Cæsar, the Emperor elect.

The facts of the case, as nearly as our reporter could determine them from the conflicting statements of eye-witnesses, were about as follows: The affair was an election row, of course. Nine-tenths of the ghastly butcheries that disgrace the city now-a-days, grow out of the bickerings and jealousies and animosities engendered by these accursed elections. Rome would be the gainer by it if her very constables were elected to serve a century, for in our experience we have never even been able to choose a dog-pelter without celebrating the event with a dozen knock-downs and a general cramming of the station-house with drunken vagabonds over night. It is said that when the immense majority for Cæsar at the polls in the market was declared the other day, and the crown was offered to that gentleman, even his amazing unselfishness in refusing it three times, was not sufficient to save him from the whispered insults of such men as Casca, of the Tenth Ward, and other hirelings of the disappointed candidate, hailing mostly from the Eleventh and Thirteenth, and other outside districts, who were overheard speaking ironically and contemptuously of Mr. Cæsar's conduct upon that occasion.

We are further informed that there are many among us who think they are justified in believing that the assassination of Julius Cæsar was a put-up thing—a cut-and-dried arrangement, hatched by Marcus Brutus and a lot of his hired roughs, and carried out only too faithfully according to the programme. Whether there be good grounds for this suspicion or not, we leave to the people to judge for themselves, only asking that they will read the following account of the sad occurrence carefully and dispassionately before they render that judgment:

The Senate was already in session, and Cæsar was coming down the street toward the capitol, conversing with some personal friends, and followed, as usual, by a large number of citizens. Just as he was passing in front of Demosthenes and Thucidydes' drug-store, he was observing casually to a gentleman who, our informant thinks, is a fortune-teller, that the Ides of March were come. The reply was, Yes, they were come, but not gone yet. At this moment Artemidorus stepped up and passed the time of day, and asked Cæsar to read a schedule or a tract, or something of the kind, which he had brought for his perusal. Mr. Decius Brutus also said something about an "humble suit" which he wanted read. Artemidorus begged that attention might be paid to his first, because it was of personal consequence to Cæsar. The latter replied that what concerned himself should be read last, or words that effect. Artemidorus begged and beseeched him to read the paper instantly. [Mark that; it is hinted by William Shakspeare, who saw the beginning and the end of the unfortunate affray, that this "schedule" was simply a note discovering to Cæsar that a plot was brewing to take his life.] However, Cæsar shook him off, and refused to read any petition in the street. He then entered the capitol, and the crowd followed him.

About this time, the following conversation was overheard, and we consider that, taken in connection with the events which succeeded it, it bears an appalling significance: Mr. Papilius Lena remarked to George W. Cassius (commonly known as the "Nobby Boy of the Third Ward,") a bruiser in the pay of the Opposition, that he hoped his enterprise to-day might thrive; and when Cassius asked, "What enterprise?" he only closed his left eye temporarily, and said with simulated indifference, "Fare you well," and sauntered toward Cæsar. Marcus Brutus, who is suspected of being the ringleader of the band that killed Cæsar, asked what it was that Lena had said; Cassius told him, and added in a low tone, "I fear our purpose is discovered."

Brutus told his wretched accomplice to keep an eye on Lena, and a moment after, Cassius urged that lean and hungry vagrant, Casca, whose reputation here is none of the best, to be sudden, for he feared prevention. He then turned to Brutus, apparently much excited, and asked what should be done, and swore that either he or Cæsar should never turn back—he would kill himself first. At this time, Cæsar was talking to some of the back-country members about the approaching fall elections, and paying little attention to what was going on around him. Billy Trebonius got into conversation with the people's friend and Cæsar's—Mark Antony—and under some pretence or other, got him away, and Brutus, Decius Casca, Cinna, Metellus Cimber, and others of the gang of infamous desperadoes that infest Rome at present, closed around the doomed Cæsar. Then Metellus Cimber knelt down and begged that his brother might be recalled from banishment, but Cæsar rebuked him for his fawning, sneaking conduct, and refused to grant his petition. Immediately, at Cimber's request, first Brutus and then Cassius begged for the return of the banished Publius; but Cæsar still refused. He said he could not be moved; that he was as fixed as the North Star, and proceeded to speak in the most complimentary terms of the firmness of that star, and its steady character. Then he said he was like it, and he believed he was the only man in the country that was; therefore, since he was "constant" that Cimber should be banished, he was also "constant" that he should st y banished, and he'd be d—d if he didn't keep him so!

Instantly seizing upon this shallow pretext for a fight, Casca sprang at Cæsar and struck him with a dirk, Cæsar grabbing him by the arm with his right hand, and launching a blow straight from the shoulder with his left, that sent the reptile bleeding to the earth. He then backed up against Pompey's statue, and squared himself to receive his assailants. Cassius and Cimber and Cinna rushed upon him with their daggers drawn, and the former succeeded in inflicting a wound upon his body, but before he could strike again, and before either of the others could strike at all, Cæsar stretched the three miscreants at his feet with as many blows of his powerful fist. By this time the Senate was in an indescribable uproar; the throng of citizens in the lobbies had blockaded the doors in their frantic efforts to escape from the building, the Sergeant-at-Arms and his assistants were struggling with the assassins, venerable Senators had cast aside their encumbering robes and were leaping over benches and flying down the aisles in wild confusion toward the shelter of the Committee-rooms, and a thousand voices were shouting "Po-lice! Po-lice!" in discordant tones that rose above the frightful din like shrieking winds above the roaring of a tempest. And amid it all, great Cæsar stood with his back against the statue, like a lion at bay, and fought his assailants weaponless and hand-to-hand, with the defiant bearing and the unwavering courage which he had shown before on many a bloody field. Billy Trebonius and Caius Legarius struck him with their daggers and fell, as their brother-conspirators before them had fallen. But at last, when Cæsar saw his old friend Brutus step forward, armed with a murderous knife, it is said he seemed utterly overpowered with grief and amazement, and dropping his invincible left arm by his side, he hid his face in the folds of his mantle and received the treacherous blow without an effort to stay the hand that gave it. He only said "Et tu, Brute?" and fell lifeless on the marble pavement.

We learn that the coat deceased had on when he was killed was the same he wore in his tent on the afternoon of the day he overcame the Nervii, and that when it was removed from the corpse it was found to be cut and gashed in no less than seven different places. There was nothing in the pockets. It will be exhibited at the Coroner's inquest, and will be damning proof of the fact of the killing. These latter facts may be relied on, as we get them from Mark Antony, whose position enables him to learn every item of news connected with the one subject of absorbing interest of to-day.

LATER.—While the Coroner was summoning a jury, Mark Antony and other friends of the late Cæsar got hold of the body and lugged it off to the Forum, and at last accounts Antony and Brutus were making speeches over it and raising such a row among the people that, as we go to press, the Chief of Police is satisfied there is going to be a riot, and is taking measures accordingly.

MARK TWAIN.

THERE is a story told of an imperial highness waltzing thrice on the same evening with an English lady at the Court of Berlin. The lady, flattered by his attention, frankly stated her gratification at the compliment. "I did not intend it as a compliment," was the answer. "Then," said the lady, "your highness must be very fond of dancing." "I detest dancing," was the still unsatisfactory response. "What, then, may I ask, can be your imperial highness's motive for dancing?" "Madam," was the exalted personage's curt reply, "I dance to perspire!"

RECOLLECTIONS OF A GOLD MINE.

SIX years ago the gold fever was imported from Australia, and for a short space of time raged in England with unmitigated violence; a greater yellowness than usual tinged the City mind, and the conversation of City men; little else was talked about, but the discovery which had just been made—that if there was one mineral with which English soil was abundantly furnished, it was the precious metal in question. With that energy of enterprise which distinguishes a great nation, companies were immediately formed for extracting the gold from the ore, and our still more enterprising neighbors across the Atlantic found a splendid field for their peculiarly inventive genius, and sent us over machines to facilitate our endeavors by amalgamating the auriferous soil with quicksilver, after pulverizing it first by the aid of steam-power.

At that particular period, I had just reached my twentieth year; but sitting in judgment over myself at this distance, I have come to the conclusion that, owing to my singular greenness and incapacity for business at the time, I was in reality much younger than my age. In spite of these unlucky characteristics, somebody who took a great interest in me (my father) had just established me in the city as an analytical chemist and mining engineer. Now if there was one thing in the world for which I was peculiarly, and I may even say, extraordinarily unfit, it was that very useful profession; but it is a well-known fact that the fondest parents are not always most discriminating in the choice of professions for their sons.

So I had spent two years in a school of chemistry, attending lectures, and performing analyses, qualitative and quantitative, and various other chemical experiments, which I used to think very droll and amusing, in order to fit myself for my future career—and at length, thanks to my father's kindness, I found myself master of a laboratory which had been arranged in a manner regardless of expense, with water and gas laid on in every possible corner, and bottles, chemical stoves, etc., of a most ornamental brightness and perfection.

Here I waited for employment daily, and entertained my friends with sumptuous hospitality at lunch and supper; here also I occasionally astouished my mother and sister, by dexterously turning yellow liquids into blue ones, and performing other marvels of science—accomplishments which I have almost entirely forgotten (in my prospectus it was stated that assays of ore and analyses of minerals, etc., would be most carefully conducted, and all business of the kind attended to, with great steadiness and despatch;) and pending the advent of work, the scene of my future operations was enlivened by athletic sports and every kind of jollification, which helped me to endure the anxiety of my parents, at seeing me start on the serious business of life, so young.

I must say, that thanks to the kindness of several friends of my family, employment came pretty rapidly: one in particular gave me a large order for analyzing various specimens of soil from his estate. I conducted these experiments with proper earnestness, and he paid me for them with becoming gravity. I now thank him kindly for the same (it would have been undignified to do so then,) and sincerely hope that he has found my scientific research beneficial to his land.

These timely helps kept the wolf from my laboratory-door for a while, and I began to think making money was easy work, and that the man who cannot earn his bread by the sweat of his brow does not deserve to eat it; when the gold contagion suddenly broke out, and committed great ravages. I caught it one rainy afternoon near the Exchange, and by the time I reached home, my brain and pulses were in a morbid state of excitement about the new discovery. My mother and sister instantly became affected; but my father, who was of a stout habit and robust temperament, and gifted with a very practical turn of mind, fortunately escaped, and devoted himself to our cure. Thanks to his very judicious nursing, I was the first to recover; indeed, next day I was punctual at my place of business, where I fenced and boxed with comparatively unimpaired vigor all the morning.

Time wore on, the gold fever raged worse, and I waited impatiently for it to give me employment; at length it did so, in a few months from the period of its birth; somebody introduced me to somebody else, who introduced me to the chairman of the Victoria Gold and Copper Mines, situated near Moleville, in Blankshire, and which was apparently in a very bad way. Upwards of £6,000 had been spent in working for gold in the course of half a year (they had left off working it for copper, of course, ever since the existence of the more precious metal had been suspected;) but although gold had been abundantly found in all the small experiments which two celebrated chemists had performed on samples collected from the mine, as soon as these same operations had been carried on on a large scale down at the spot, nothing beyond the merest traces of gold had been realized.

There was a mystery about this which was solved by the matter-of-fact instinct of my dear papa, in a way so very uncomplimentary to some person or persons unknown, that I really think it better not to say anything further on the subject.

The Chairman of the Victoria Gold and Copper Mine was favorably impressed with me. A meeting of the Board of Directors was held forthwith, and it was solemnly and unanimously decided that I should analyze a sample of the ore which had been just lately forwarded.

Here was a moment of delicious excitement! Perfect strangers, men of sense and experience, utterly unbiassed by any friendly motives towards my family, trusting me with an important trial, the result of which might affect the welfare of lots of people besides their own! Cheapside itself looked narrow when I walked out of that board-room.

The sample was most conscientiously analyzed; crushed into fine powder, I recollect, triturated with quicksilver, in a small machine invented on purpose by Mr. Perkes, an American (a gigantic specimen of which was rolling itself round and round in Blankshire at no little cost.) The quicksilver was carefully and decorously distilled, and left a small residuum which was fused with litharge, and afterwards melted again in a beautiful little white thing called a cupel; and the result was a most surprising button of pure gold, sufficiently large in proportion to the matrix to justify the formation of the Victoria Gold and Copper Mine, and even to encourage the most sanguine hopes.

When I took the report of my analysis and the button, and exultingly laid them before the chairman, he was considerably less astonished than I expected him to be. This latter experiment had merely turned out as the others had done, and was therefore no novelty to him; and he could not conceive by what hitch in the machinery, by what imperfection of manipulation, everything had hitherto failed down at the mine. No more could I; but my good angel prompted me to hold my tongue, and look preternaturally wise; so much so that Mr. Chairman, who was fond of quotation, said:

"Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas," which was very much to the point.

"Ahem! Felix, indeed," said I, trying to look very happy.

At length Mr. Chairman asked me whether it would suit my convenience to go down to the mine, in the event of the Board requiring me to do so.

Now my good father had instructed me to repress all boyish enthusiasm at any proposition of this kind, and without implying the slightest falsehood, to give a strong impression that such a journey, just at that particular moment, would involve the most serious risk to my interests in the city; and, I believe, I acted this to perfection.

Two days after, I received a polite note, requesting my attendance at the Board of Committee on the following afternoon, if convenient. I wrote a hurried reply to say that I would manage to find time at twenty-three minutes past four, and immediately went home to prepare myself for the great event by a serious consultation with my family.

My mother was of opinion that my manners and appearance were such as to conciliate any board. My sister was of the same opinion as my mother.

My father moved that, with all due deference to maternal and fraternal pride, these characteristics were not of sufficient weight to make sober city men entrust me with a mission of such great responsibility.

It was necessary, he said, that in my interview with the directors next day, I should cram them with every possible technical term that had ever been invented for the purpose, and he advised me to read them up forthwith in a manual for mining engineers, as the facts of the case were so simple that they would fail to impress the gentlemen of the managing committee, unless properly dished up and garnished, and served with suitable pomp and solemnity.

Here were the facts of the case in their rude simplicity:

Firstly. If, after carefully selecting samples from the mine, and crushing some twenty tons of the same in the machine with quicksilver, and, in short, going through all the necessary operations, (a thing I should feel very much embarrassed to do now,) if, he said, I did find gold, such a result would be encouraging, but not all conclusive. Who knows? One of the people employed might, by accident, drop his purse containing gold into the machinery, and fail to remember the circumstance after. There, if I did find gold, my duty was to repeat the experiment over again till I didn't.

Secondly. If, on the other hand, I did not find gold, either in the quicksilver or the residue, the experiment would be quite conclusive, and my duty was to come back immediately and advise the board of direction to wind up the affairs of the company, and not waste any more money on such a fool's errand—and, as he was perfectly sure I should not find gold, why, I need not trouble myself any further about the matter.

I could not but see the force of these arguments, and acted accordingly. I presented myself at the board next day a perfect dictionary of scientific mining expletives, and spoke in a most encouraging way of the prospects of the mine; stating that, if it contained gold enough to pay, the Victoria Gold Mining Company would, if well managed, probably be a very successful venture; that if it did not, my business would be to find it out and break the truth to them in a straightforward and business-like manner; adding that, possibly, the gentlemen, my predecessors, had not found gold, but by excess of delicacy, had lacked the moral courage to tell them the real reason of their failure—namely, that perhaps no gold to find—and had thus allowed them to incur expense after expense. I hoped, however, that such was not really the case, and that a very few days would decide the matter, should we agree as to terms, etc.

This was merely the substance of my discourse, for, by a lucky inspiration, I managed to make it last a long time, and to squeeze "lodes," "gossans," "costeanings," and other impressive words into almost every sentence. It produced a very great effect on the directors, and even on myself; and after a few questions on their part, which I answered with great discretion, (my father had foreseen everything,) they retired to the adjoining room, where they laid their heads together for at least twenty minutes.

My excitement during this consultation was such as I had never felt before, and my efforts to appear unconcerned before the office-clerk were alone worth the remuneration I was to receive for my invaluable assistance.

At length the chairman came out to speak to me privately, and, after humming and hawing me into a state of distraction, he told me that they had severally come to the conclusion—first, that I was very young; secondly, that they had spent a great deal of money on the mine without having as yet attained any positive result.

These were facts I did not venture to contradict. He then said that if a guinea a day for my salary, and half a guinea a day for my expenses, would compensate for my time and trouble, the board would decide upon sending me down.

If a guinea a day, indeed! I felt a wild impulse to embrace the whole board in the person of that venerable fat old fellow, but fortunately succeeded in restraining myself. I told him I would think of the matter, and return him an answer the following day; and, after bowing myself first into the office-clerk and then into the fire-place, I eventually succeeded in making an unconcerned exit.

I pass over my triumphant sensations and the family bliss, only chequered by anxiety lest the Victoria Gold and Copper Mine should come to grief before I got there. My answer to the board was, of course, favorable. I had soon completed all my little preparations, and on a splendid afternoon in August I found myself in the express train on the Great Western line, with the engineer of the mine, with whom I soon got on the very best of terms; a most sensible, lively, and gentlemanlike man, whose opinions on the gold question coincided so singularly with my father's, that I was naturally led to confide in him to a great extent, and found his advice as to my future conduct invaluable.

I will not attempt to describe the details of my journey, which were all delightful—the ride at early dawn through the most enchanting lanes to Moleville; the delightful acquaintance I made on the top of the stage-coach, which completely drove mining and gold out of my head, etc.—but come at once to my business.

We walked from Moleville to the mine through a series of beautiful miniature woods and valleys—a short cut which the engineer, who had a fine eye for the picturesque, particularly recommended—and suddenly the first mine which I, a mining engineer of some standing, had ever beheld, burst upon my view. A few outhouses and buildings, two gigantic water-wheels—erected at immense expense by my friend the engineer, whose fine eye for the picturesque made him do things grandly—a lot of red soil and broken granite lying about, and many skeletons of former crushing-machines which had reigned in turn till Mr. Perkes's victorious crusher had crushed them all into oblivion—such was the aspect that unrolled itself to my astonished eye. We made our way to a small outhouse of greater pretension than the rest, and I was there introduced to the captain of the mine—in other words, the head-miner—who was to be under my orders. After a few minutes' conversation, during which he treated me with a respectful deference I was not accustomed to meet with in gray-haired men, I was conducted to a brick building surmounted by a tall chimney, from which issued a rolling and thundering noise—the voice of Mr. Perkes's machine. Some five-and-twenty or thirty shaggy, rough-looking men were about. These were the miners. Their appearance was not reassuring, and when the engineer left me alone with them, with a parting injunction that I was to make them feel I had an iron will at once, I confess I felt myself uncomfortably young, and a little at a loss.

We proceeded to business at once, however; and as I met their first little symptoms of insubordination with one or two acts of summary justice, (which I will spare the reader, but which, emanating from me, caused me unlimited astonishment,) I soon established a proper authority over them, and we thenceforward got on together capitally.

I must now explain, in as brief and clear a manner as I can, the nature of the work I had to do, and the way I did it. I am afraid these scientific details will bore my readers to read, as they bore me to write them—and think that the best and shortest way is by transcribing a few extracts from my diary at the time.

But first it is necessary to state that, for three weeks previous to my arrival, Perkes's machine had been working indefatigably night and day; and on the very morning I got there, the last ton was got through the ordeal, and after disporting itself in the machine, impulpably pulverized with the mercury, was running off with the water in a kind of clear red mud, having of course left all its gold behind it. Now, three weeks of miners' wages, wear and tear of machinery, and unavoidable loss of mercury, must have cost a pretty considerable sum of money; I will not venture to say how much, as my information on such subjects is generally not to be relied upon; but if the reader possesses any of the practical turn which I lack, he will be able to form a tolerably correct estimate of the amount of gold necessary to cover these expenses, compensate for the original outlay, and pay a dividend.

"August -th.—Arrived at mine; rusticated W——, for shying his hat at me, and fined O—— and H—— half-crown apiece for grinning when I took a razor-strop out of my carpet-bag. When all the gossan was crushed, had machine stopped, and mercury drawn off and put into the still; luted cover of still on, and stamped luting secretly in two places with a crooked sixpence, to prevent mischief. Had the still put on the fire; left it under the charge of Hodge, who seems very much afraid of me, with particular directions not to inhale the fumes.

"Bright idea—tested the red mud from the machine for gold—not a trace of it—all in the mercury. Went home to dinner. Ten o'clock; uneasy about Hodge; walked to the mine; beautiful night; Hodge nearly suffocated; stupid fool had shut the ventilator; blew him up; put Westmacott in his place; distillery going on well. Owen nearly pushed me into a mud-vat—perhaps accident. Home to bed.

"August -th (next day.)—Hodge all right again; gave him some cavendish and half-a-crown. All the mercury distilled; took the cover off; scraped residuum carefully out; fused it—cupelled it. All the fellows in great excitement. Hodge dreadfully sick—cavendish and heat of the stove, I suppose; gave him some peppermint drops. Took the cupel out and cleared the smithy. General excitement interferes with regularity of business. Deuced excited myself. Cupel cooled; little button of gold; weighed it—value one shilling and seven pence half penny; regular shut-up for the Victoria."

It is unnecessary to quote any further from my diary; indeed I find, after a careful perusal, that I left it off just at this particular stage of the proceedings, and used it as a sketch-book. Such a result was unmistakably conclusive, and gave rise to no little commotion among the miners, some of whom thought proper to be very witty about the whole business. I immediately wrote to the board:

"GENTLEMEN.—It's all up with the Victoria, and the works had better be stopped at once, as far as gold is concerned. I enclose you my report, and await your orders to return to town, as my remaining here any longer is of course an useless expense. "I remain, etc."

The enclosed report stated that thirty tons of gossan had yielded so much gold (I forget the weight of the minute button), value 1*s.* 7½*d.*, and that the perfect efficiency of Perkes's machine had been proved by the complete absence of gold in the residue after it had passed through said machine; the inevitable conclusion from which was, that the mine contained no more than the infinitesimal quantity of gold which had been found to exist nearly everywhere.

My friend the engineer, who was returning to London that night, volunteered to be the bearer of this sad communication.

Two days after I received the answer, in which I expected to find unequivocal commendation of the rapid manner in which I had hit upon the truth, and the disinterested advice I had given them. To my great surprise, however, it was a very angry letter, complaining of the unbusiness-like way in which I had stated the bitter truth. A thing of such moment was not to be decided in that flippant manner, after so much money had been spent, and trouble incurred, for the last six months. They stated, moreover, that my duty was to remain as long as they pleased, and begged that I would henceforward be kind enough (!) to carry out several experiments which they would in course of due time suggest. Such was the subject of this peculiar epistle, on the back of which the chairman—no doubt with the kind intention of softening, in a measure, its asperity —nad written a Greek quotation, which I have not yet been able to make out.

Well, of course I was eontent enough to remain in the land of clover, and so I made up my mind to stay. The "experiments" were suggested; I performed them, and very great recreation they afforded me: they consisted principally in superintending the manufacture of mud-pies on a very large scale, the manipulation of which was entrusted to the miners. Mud-pies had been a favorite accomplishment of my own, not very many years ago, and occasionally I could not resist the temptation of lending a hand to my shaggy friends, and messing myself from head to foot. The mercury whieh entered into their composition rendered them a great improvement on the unsophisticated mud-pies of infancy, and the subsequent little chemical tests instituted by the board lent additional interest; besides which, they cost a great deal of money.

My letters to the board contained very scieutific reports of our proceedings, and were met by grave answers, accompauied by new suggestions.

Amongst other wonders, a large case was sent down from London, in which was the model of a machine, whieh, if successful, was to supersede Mr. Perkes's, as if Mr. Perkes's were to blame! One of the directors had invented it (he was a retired officer); I will not attempt to describe the marvellous piece of mechanism which had emanated from the depths of that military gentleman's consciousness; but merely state that it turned out to be a perfect Irish bull of a machine, and that to use it for its intended purpose was about as wise as attempting to go round the world in twenty-four hours, by ascending in a balloon and waiting till the earth had turned itself round, as I believe it usually does in that time. Nevertheless we set it to work, and it behaved splendidly; the nature of its fun was so broad as to tickle even the most uneducated intellects, as my men soon found out to their inexhaustible delight: in fact, it had some of the powerfully comic qualities which distinguish Mr. Robson.

The miners did not believe in the mine, and as they perceived that I did not either, they believed in me to a most flattering extent. Indeed, I soon got very much attached to the fellows, and used to tell them long stories about foreign lands, while they were distilling this pure mercury, or performing other innocent operations suggested by the board, aud enlighten them on various subjects on which I felt their ignorance to be equal to, or greater, than my own. They reciprocated my anecdotes with long yarns which were full of interest. My letters home contained descriptions and sketches of them, and my mamma became interested in their spiritual welfare. Even now I entertain feelings of friendship towards two or three of them, who, surrounded by the halo of memory, seem primitive gentlemen worthy of King Arthur's Round Table; and should they have acquired the accomplishment of reading since we parted, and this happen to meet their eye, I hope they will remember that very jolly month of September and me.

Besides all this excitement, existence was full of charm for me between the hour of my leaving the mine and that of my returning to it next day. I was soon on terms of the most intimate friendship with many of the surrounding farmers and small gentry of the neighborhood. It was a constant round of festivities either at their houses or my hotel, where I occasionally entertained them with an elegant hospitality which exalted our jovial good fellowship into the most sentimental affection towards the small hours of the night. How I rode and wrestled, and boxed with them! and fell in love with their sisters, and sketched them, and sang Tyrolese melodies to them, an accomplishment imitated from Herr von Joel, and in which I had completely surpassed my model (if the opinion of these young ladies, who had never heard him, is to be accounted of any value.) It was most uproarious fun, and morning, noon, and night I blessed the lucky stroke of Fortune which had made me mining engineer to a gold mine, without any gold, managed by gentlemen who obstinately persisted in ignoring the latter important fact, in spite of my honest endeavors to persuade them of it. I have only to hum a certain "jodel" chorus, and the whole scene returns to me, surrounded by that peculiar fascination which belongs to past pleasures—a phenomenon far more interesting to me than the most marvellous phenomena of science.

Thus the days wore on in golden peace and plenty; when towards the end of September I received a letter from London, announcing that the directors intended to come down to the mine in person, in the course of a few days, to satisfy themselves that I had carefully and conscientiously fulfilled the mission they had entrusted to me, and witness the absence of the gold with their own eyes.

Everything was prepared to receive them, and when the day arrived, there was a certain appearance of festivity about the mine which could not fail to produce a pleasing effect upon the expected visitors. The captain was got up in a surprising suit of clothes, which consisted principally in a yellow waistcoat, and some of the miners had washed their faces!

At about mid-day three open carriages made their appearance, and five gentlemen, whom I had already met in London, (two of whom had brought wives, and daughters, and hampers, with them,) got out of the vehicles with the air of men who had an important duty to perform.

I received them, I trust, in a manner becoming to the occasion, and we immediately proceeded to business. They inspected everything with the eye of a hawk. They too, since I had left them, had made themselves thoroughly proficient in those technical terms without which no science can ever rest on a solid basis; but occasionally applied them in rather a reckless manner, I must say. They took especial interest in the experiments their combined wisdom had dictated, and criticised them with a gravity which I am sorry to say some of my men thought fit to see from a humorous point of view. The military gentleman insisted upon seeing his machine work, and asked me if I did not think it "rather a neat thing?" I gave him great satisfaction by telling him that it was very pretty, must have cost a great deal of money, and revolved on itself in a charmingly symmetrical manner.

The ladies of the party asked many questions, and interested themselves in everything with a prettiness, an inconsistency, a sudden running away from one thing to another which is peculiar to the sex, I suppose, on such occasions, and which was perfectly bewildering to my shaggy friends.

About an hour was spent in this lively manner, and at last the directors came to conclusions that were favorable to Mr. Perkes's gold-crushing machine and to me, completely exonerating us both from any charge of inefficiency as far as our part of the work was concerned; the captain and the miners also came in for their share of approbation, and the latter were generously tipped.

The serious part of the day's business being now over, they invited me to partake of lunch with them. The hampers were unpacked, and delicious cold things were laid out on the grass, beneath the combined shadows of a wide-spreading chestnut tree and one of the huge water-wheels; everybody was in the best of tempers, and we soon got very happy indeed. There was a pastoral freshness about this way of settling gold mines which had an inexpressible charm. The total ruin of the Victoria, which had just been de facto decided, did not in the slightest degree cloud the merriment of our little picnic; it had been tacitly brought about, (the ruin, not the picnic,) and was tacitly ignored.

As soon as the meal was over, the young ladies of the party took out their albums, and jotted down parts of the surrounding landscape with a rapidity at which Turner would have stood aghast. How they chatted and laughed, and how happy they were! The element of the gushing nature was in them, and a thimblefull of champagne had brought it out. I also had drunk champagne, a little too much perhaps, and gushed in unison. I complimented them on their performance with the brush in several languages, two of which I really knew, as my education had been continental; and praised the tender chocolate hue of their trees, and the deep ultra-marine of their back-grounds, and even went so far as to suggest that a delicate check-pattern for their cows would be very appropriate. Papas and mammas looked on delighted. I also enlivened the fore-gathering with the loudest Tyrolese ditties those hills had ever echoed, and two sisters sang "Excelsior" to the accompaniment of a guitar, which a mamma produced out of one of the carriages. Meanwhile, alas! my Knights of the Round Table were getting most desperately drunk in the smithy.

The shades of eve were falling fast by the time we left the mine; my new friends kindly offered me a lift to Moleville, and packed me up comfortably in an empty hamper at the back of one of the vehicles. As we drove off, the miners all came out of the smithy, hurrahing with great uncertainty of voice, and waving their hats enthusiastically; in fact, they waved everything about them. We made rather a pretty procession through the lovely Blankshire lanes, as the sun was setting and the trees were swerving overhead with a beautiful rushing noise; the ladies leaned back with their arms round each others' waists, and the gentlemen smiled and nodded majestically, like powerful gods in dalliance. As we lost sight of the mine I heard the men cheering me vociferously; and I swayed to and fro in my food-basket with a delightful reckless feeling that everthing in life was jolly, especially business. The chairman informed me that "It was the hour when lovers' vows seem sweet in ev'ry whispered word;" and another director told me that I was to return to London next day, and hold myself in readiness for something, which I did not catch on account of the chairman's quotation. I answered, "As in præsenti perfectum format in avi," and that I would hold myself in readiness for any mortal thing they could suggest.

When we arrived at Moleville, the ladies left us, and we men finished the evening together, I believe, at the hotel; indeed, the effect of the day's excitement and beautiful ride home on my peculiarly impressive temperament, made the rest of that evening a mystery to me, and I have no doubt to one or two gentlemen of the managing committee besides.

Next morning we all breakfasted together in the large room of the hotel. Some of the directors made their meal entirely off soda-water—half-a-dozen bottles at least. I think they had two or three headaches, for they complained of the relaxing nature of the climate. The ladies, however, were charmingly brisk and amiable, and I was getting wonderfully fond of the whole lot. But alas! the time for parting was at hand, and by the time I had finished my bottle of soda-water, I perceived that the carriages were at the door, which were to convey them all to a neighboring watering-place. The parting was very affectionate on both sides: they all expressed themselves much delighted with me, and were profuse in their invitations and offers of hospitality, especially the military gentleman, who had invented that funny machine. The chairman told me to prepare a clever matter-of-fact report, in such a way that the shareholders should perceive that everything had been done that could have been done—no stone left unturned—no useless expense incurred; adding that he really took a paternal interest in me, and that possibly my prospects in life might in a measure depend on the way in which I should manage this important, and he might say, delicate business.

Everybody else said things to the same purpose, and as they drove away, after many shakings of hands and mutual good wishes, the chairman turned round on his box and said: "Verbum sap.—my dear boy—Fare thee well!"

I felt very sad at their departure; we had all seemed to get on together so well, and understand each other so capitally; the only slight thing I couldn't quite understand was "verbum sap.," and who "sap." was.

So I turned with a sigh towards the mine, where I had another parting scene to go through with my merrie men. When I got there, I found they all knew that I was leaving them, and had even scented out that their services would not be available much longer on that particular mine. All this made them very gloomy indeed, and I did my best to cheer them up by a little farewell speech which made me feel very much inclined to shed tears. They had packed up my few chemicals in the trap which was to convey me to the stage-coach, and among them many little presents and tokens of remembrance. One gave me a tobacco pouch, another a short black pipe, which I determined not to use till age had made my constitution stronger. The captain presented me with a small Testament, and the smith with two little jars of cream for my mother; even Hodge, who was the poorest of the poor, pressed upon my acceptance a beautiful dead snake, which emitted a very powerful odor.

Several of them walked by the side of my trap for a little way, and when I finally shook hands with them, after a little go of whisky all round, I thought what a jolly thing it would be to go off mining to Anstralia together, and meet with a lot of adventures—I to be the desperado captain of the gang.

At the hotel where the stage-coach stopped, I found several of my country friends, who had come to wish me good-by. I recollect inviting them all to my father's house in London, and shaking hands over and over again, and having several parting cups with them—after which the stage-coach started, and I don't recollect whether I rode inside or out,

Next morning I was in London, under the paternal roof and amidst the maternal caresses. After I had given a minute account of my proceedings over the family breakfast-table, during which his majesty my dear papa was often graciously moved to laughter, he expressed great satisfaction at my conduct, (I omitted a few unimportant details, of course, such as our bacchic performances at the hotel, which I reserved for the entertainment of my own particular pals;) my mother listened with affectionate gravity, and sometimes shook her head—but in the eyes of my sister, who had just recently attained to the dignity of long petticoats and womanhood, after an attack of the measles, which had taken place during my absence,) I was evidently a sort of a hero, to be treated henceforward with a certain deference.

About a week was to elapse before the much-dreaded meeting of the shareholders; and my father and I set to work together on my report, which was to be a marvel of scientific clearness and precision. My sister was amanuensis, and my mother sat by to soften the little crudities; and soon a very neat and concise little affair was arranged, and when I read it out loud in several tones of voice for the sake of practice, it met each time with the universal approbation of the family.

I sent it in next day, addressed to the chairman, feeling sure that it would increase the really paternal favor with which he regarded me; and this little responsibility being off my hands, and my family leaving London for the sea-side, I gave myself up entirely to my friends for the rest of the week.

At length, on the evening of the day which preceded the general meeting of the shareholders, I received a note from Mr. Chairman, (who, it appeared, had just returned to town from a Somersetshire watering-place,) saying that my report was too short and matter-of-fact, too drily scientific, and that another should be immediately written, which, besides the invaluable quality of truth, should possess a little of the elegance of fiction; that it was all very well to confine myself to mere technicalities in my private correspondence with him and his brother directors, to whom the arcana of science were no mystery, but that many of the gentlemen who would hear this report on the following day were not fitted by education to understand it; that, in short, I must know very well the sort of thing he meant, and he relied entirely upon my intelligence and good-will.

Now that very evening I was going to a musical party, which I would not have missed for any consideration, and should have thought it very hard to give up such a classical treat, merely because nature had endowed Mr. Chairman with a poetical constitution; so I quietly popped the report into another envelope and sent it back, with a polite message to the effect that I would be most happy to develop my theories by viva voce explanation the following day.

The musical party lasted all night, and I confess that the exciting effect of "Down among the Dead Men," and the "Holy Friar," and other compositions, had scarcely subsided by the time fixed for the meeting of the shareholders on the morrow. I was very punctual, however, and walked calmly into the board-room, where I indicated myself in a series of bows. Many were assembled there, and their faces were "ashen and sober as the leaves that are crisped and sere," as I observed to the chairman. He was not at all in a mood, however, for that sort of thing, and seemed exceedingly stiff and formal; the muse had evidently quite forsaken him. I soon felt that the business of the day was no longer to be characterized by that idyllic tenderness I had found down in Blankshire; the other directors looked very grave; the mild eyes of the military gentleman were filled with dismay. There were several gentlemen present whom I had never seen, but whom I recognized as shareholders by the length of their faces. The only face in which I saw anything like cordiality or facetiousness was that of my friend the engineer, whom I immediately greeted in the most impulsive manner.

Sheets of foolscap and blotting paper were ominously laid out on the table before each place.

Presently one of my predecessors in the chemical business of the mine, the eminent analytical chemist Mr. Ex, made his appearance, and to him I was introduced, but he chose to acknowledge my very respectful salutation with contemptuous indifference. I immediately made a mental estimate of his weight. Shortly after, Mr. Zed, my other eminent rival, walked in, and he did not acknowledge my respectful salutation at all. The caricatures I made of them both on my sheet of blotting-paper were afterwards pronounced first-rate by my friend the engineer.

We sat down in stormy silence; I was at the right hand of the chairman, and supported the military gentleman on my other side. The other directors filled their respective places at the board, and the shareholders stood or sat all about the room.

The chairman opened the proceedings by a sort of general statement of things, which appeared to me rather confused. It comprised, however, a very plausible account of all that had been done before I was employed, and of all the money that had been spent, and how; and it took a very long time to deliver.

It enlarged on the zeal, cleverness, and inestimable services of my friend the engineer, who rose and acknowledged the compliment with a few smiling, gentlemanlike, and appropriate words; after which he made a comprehensive bow all round, the elegance of which I have never seen surpassed, and then he left the room.

Mr. Chairman then expatiated on the admirable and necessarily expensive manner in which Messrs. Zed and Ex had fulfilled their parts; how, owing to circumstances which he thought it unnecessary to enter into then, their efforts had not met with the success they deserved; how, at length they had decided upon availing themselves of my assistance in spite of my extreme youth; how he and the other directors, waiving all considerations of personal convenience, had gone down to the mine themselves, and at their own expense, to see that I had managed everything properly; how, in short, I had done everything they had suggested in the most careful and conscientious manner, and how they had been led thereby to the conclusions which would be found, not so much in my report, which I had thought fit to make exceedingly short and technical, as in the explanations which I had kindly volunteered to give viva voce.

He then read my report, which stated the nature of the experiments performed by me from first to last, and their complete failure, and ascribed the cause thereof to the fact that gold did not exist in the Victoria Gold and Copper Mines. I thought it sounded very nice, and that the chairman had a very impressive voice, and read it beautifully. I was especially struck with the dignity with which I had invested the mud-pie experiments by describing them scientifically.

When he had finished, nobody asked for a viva voce explanation of my eloquent little composition, which everybody appeared to understand perfectly well; but the chairman said that I was desirous of addiug a few remarks, and squeezed my hand under the table in a very friendly mauner.

Now I must say that the latter part of Mr. Chairman's extempore oration, in which he had allnded to my services, did uot exactly thrill me with feelings of unmixed delight; for he had allotted to me a very secondary part in the important discovery which had been made—uamely, the absence of gold in the Victoria Gold Mine; and as I had piqued myself on being the originator of the said important discovery, I thought it very unpaternal in him not to give me credit for the same; added to which, the very nnfraternal behavior ol my confreres Messrs. Zed & Ex towards me had excited legitimate feelings of resentment in my bosom.

So I reciprocated the pressure of the chairman's fingers, cleared my throat, and delivered the followiug memorable address:

Gentlemen.—Accustomed ns I am to pnblic speaking—(which was perfectly true, for to public speaking I owe some of the sweetest naps I ever enjoyed)—I find it a matter of great difficulty to account for the nnfortunate delusion under which all assembled here have been laboring for the last six months. I went down to the Victoria mine in August, and proved it, as per report, to contain no more gold than is to be found in traces everywhere, even in sea water. It took me two days to make this discovery, and I immediately begged the directors to allow me to return to London. They were anxious, however, that everything should be done, no stone left unturned, no useless expense spared with—(kicks under the table—I mean no useless expense incurred, and insisted on my remaining at the mine; so I obeyed their orders, in spite of my own conviction; and I believe that literally every stoue on that miue has not only beeu turned, but reduced to an impalpable state by the experiments which the directors sngested, experiments which ought to have drawn blood from any stone, gentlemen. There was oue instrument in particular, invented by (here the military gentleman's foot came down on mine with a crash)—an instrument, in short, which revolved on its axis for nearly a month, with a persistency that was quite pathetic; but in spite of its great merit, it was not exactly calculated to find a mineral which did not exist, and it failed to do so, probably owing to that very reason.

The only cause to which I can ascribe this extraordinary and, to me, monstrous deception, is a certain pheuomenon over which I have puzzled in vain, gentlemen, and which Messrs. Zed and Ex may possibly be able to explain to you; I allude to the fact that gold was found to exist abundantly in the samples which were sent up to London for analysis.

Messrs. Zed and Ex have had much greater experience than I can boast; they were sent down to the mine repeatedly before I was employed; their remuneratiou was in proportion to the very high standing they occupy in the scientific world, as was also the unlimited confidence with which they managed to inspire the directors. Their numerous experments, and the various quartz-crushing machines they have invented, and which are now lying all over the mine in a very rusty state, have cost you nearly 3,000*l.*; and upon my honor, gentlemeu, I cau no more account for the positively ludicrous incompetency they have showu, to say the least, than I can for the wonderful simplicity of the directors, or the monstrous absurdity of the whole affair from beginniug to end! . . .

At this particular point the faces of Messrs. Zed and Ex grew so like my caricature of them, that my gravity being disturbed, I completely lost the thread of my discourse, and was obliged to bring it to an abrupt termination.

The shareholders, who had emphasized certain little passages towards the close of my harangue, by occasional "hear—hears," applauded with an energy that was flattering to nobody but me.

I cast an appealing look round the board, and the general expression of the faces which I saw there convinced me that I had somehow forfeited the regard of the directors, aud made two very enthusiastic enemies of Messrs. Zed and Ex—in fact, that the place was getting rather hot for me; so I inquired of the chairman if he had any farther questions to ask, aud on his rather hurried reply in the negative, I pleaded important mining business to attend to, and left the room with a bow, which I tried to make as much like that of my friend the engineer, as possible.

A stormy discussion, audible in the street without, arose immediately after my departure, and I have no doubt the meeting was carried on after a very lively fashion, aud that many remarks were elicited which were not of a very soothiug nature to all parties coucerned.

I, for my own part, felt tolerably happy, and did not experience any loss of appetite; I even sang with great brilliancy of execution at another musical party to which I was invited that evening.

On the morrow I was startled by receiving a very cold and concise letter from the board, stating that my services would be dispeused with for the future, and enclosing a cheque, for which it requested my acknowledgment. The chairman had written no apposite quotation from the Greek on the back of it, to temper the bitterness of my congé. But I found consolation in the cheque, and in the wonderful sensation of having blundered on to what appeared to me the right thing in this particular business, in spite of my inaptitude for business generally.

So I went down to the sea-side to recruit my health, and enjoy the approbation of my family. My father laughed very heartily at my description of the meeting of the shareholders, and told me that I had put my foot in it up to the arm-pits—which was his way of expressing that it was all right. My mother aud sister were enthusiastic in their commendations—and I felt that my late experience had fitted me morally to undergo the operation of shaving, in spite of all physical deficiency; and as that had been the object of my ambition for the last few months, I obtained the permission of my dear papa, and adopted the harmless habit forthwith.

It may be interesting to the reader to know that when I returned to town, the affairs of the Victoria Gold and Copper Mining Company had been wound up, and that the mine itself had entirely changed hands. At the present moment it is paying a handsome dividend, having been worked very successfully for copper under another name.

Query—How did the gold get into the samples?

Moral.—The mysteries of science are inscrutable to the uninitiated mind.

NEW BOOKS.

We are indebted to Messrs. Roman & Co. for a number of specimen volumes selected from their regular installment of new books received by the last steamer. The supply is liberal and the list long. The war, high duties, and the Presidential campaign do not seem to affect the demand, or decrease the number daily issued from the Eastern presses. While the supply of miscellaneous reading has not fallen off, the poetical, historical, and romantic episodes of our great struggle are beginning to find expression through our literature. Although at present crude and undigested, as events recede in the past it will improve in quality, and there is material euough for all the poets, novelists and historians which the next cycle may bring forth. We have noticed already a few volumes of this class, but in the present list, the red, white and blue of the "Songs of the Soldiers," is the only representative.

An American Dictionary of the English Language. By Noah Webster, LL.D. Thoroughly revised, and greatly enlarged and improved, by Chauncey A. Goodrich, D.D., LL.D., and Noah Porter, D.D. Springfield, Mass.: G. & C. Merriam. 1864. San Francisco: Roman & Co.

This new edition of Webster's well-known work, greatly enlarged and improved, is a complete and remarkable volume, combining the advantages of encyclopœdia and dictionary. For general refereuce, the present edition must stand unequalled among the lexicons of the age. Thirty years have elapsed since its first publication by Noah Webster; seventeen years since, Goodrich revised it, in 1847; and five years since, the issue of the first "Pictorial Edition." Constant accessions and contribntions to the language, new systems of nomenclature, and technical terms introduced by the advancement and development of the arts and sciences, have already enlarged the dictionary, while several vocabularies not hitherto published have been added. Dr. Webster's etymology has received the endorsement of the highest authority. The vocabulary, though large, has been rigidly scrutinized, and many self-explaining compounds have been rejected. The original book embraced a vocabulary of 80,000 words. The editions of 1840 and 1847, added several thousands more. The Pictorial edition of 1859 increased that number by 10,000, making 99,798 words. Worcester's edition of 1860 contained about 104,000 words, and the present edition of Webster exceeds this by 10,000. The definitions are accurate, and have been revised to correspond with the new significance and shades of meaning attached to certain words. "Contraband—a negro slave or a freed slave in time of war," is a contribution of the rebellion. The special departments have been carefully attended to by competent editors. One very valuable feature of the volume are the synonyms, now incorporated in the body of the work. Three thousand pictorial illustrations are scattered through its pages or grouped together in classes at the end of the volume. A number of tales form some valuable additions; among them are "Explanatory and Pronouncing Vocabulary of the Names of Noted Fictitious Persons, Places, etc.," by William N. Wheeler, which has received the endorsement of Hawthorne, Everett, Holmes, Longfellow, Whittier, and the prominent literary men of America. Professor Thatcher, of Yale, has revised "The Pronouncing Vocabulary of Greek and Latin Proper Names." An "Etymological Vocabulary of Modern Geographical Names," is a new feature, and shows the peculiar fitness or derivation of names of particular localities, mountains, towns, etc. We observe also as novelties, "Pronouncing Vocabulary of Common English Christian Names of Men and Women," with their signification, etc. Unusually full and complete. "Quotations, Words, Phrases, Proverbs, etc., from the Greek, the Latin, and Modern Foreign Languages;" "Abbreviations and Contractions used in Writing and Printing;" "Arbitrary Signs used in Writing and Printing." This table (which is remarkably full and valuable) gives, and explains the meaning and origin of, Astronomical, Botanical, Chemical, Mathematical, Medical, Miscellaneous, Monetary or Commercial, Musical, and Typographical signs or symbols of all sorts. "Ancient, Foreign and Remarkable Alphabets." This edition is undoubtedly the best dictionary of the language. The typography, though very fine, is clear and distinct, the binding excellent, and the pictorial illustrations are artistically good. Altogether, for a volume of this formidable size, the bookwork is marvellously handsome.

Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe and the East—being a Guide through Great Britain and Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Spain, Russia, Denmark, and Sweden. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. With a railroad map corrected up to 1864, and a map embracing colored routes of travel in the above countries. Third Year. 8vo. pp. 619. New York: Harper & Bro. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

An American "Murray," containing in a single volume all the information, fact, and directious which in the famous English guide-book series, were scattered through a number of volumes. The Yankee tourist will not be obliged to carry a small library with him and change his book every time he crosses a frontier line. Mr. Fetridge sketches out a plan for short continental excursions, giving, what is most important to the tourist, an estimate of the expense. Seven hundred dollars will give the traveller three months on the Continent and enable him to visit the principal points of interest. Two thousand dollars, not much more than the annual expenses of an individual of moderate means, will give him the run of Europe for a year. The directions are minute and comprehensive, with a fair margin for accidents and incidents of travel, and the suggestions and advice have a sensible, matter-of-fact flavor that attracts the general reader. The work has been corrected and issued annually for the last three years. The Author, who resides in Europe, has had the benefit of considerable experience, and, during the past year, has rewritten the greater portion of the work, adding and correcting up to July of the present year, making this the latest by two years of any guide-book.

Essays on Social Subjects, from the Saturday Review. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1864. 16mo. pp. 351. San Francisco: Roman & Co.

A collection of papers by a contributor to the London Saturday Review. They treat of topics similar to those which the Country Parson made the subject of his "Recreations," in Fraser's Magazine. Less general and liberal than the "Recreations," they exhibit that strong practical sense, worldly wisdom and blunt satire which is the peculiar tone of this eminently English review, set forth in its usual bull-dogmatic and oracular manner. The reader is pretty certain, however, to find no false sentimentality in this book, and very little sham of any kind, and if he can only stand a little plain talk and some wholesome prejudices, will be all the better for reading it. Although treating of English social topics, and being more or less governed by the usages of social life as peculiar to England, the application is broad and universal, and the following extract belongs to no particular latitude:

SAYING DISAGREEABLE THINGS.

Some people, not otherwise ill-natured, are apt to season their conversation with disagreeable sayings, unpleasant comments, uncomfortable insinuations. Such a person, we sometimes hear, is a good sort of fellow, but he has a way of saying disagreeable things. Such a woman can be very charming when she pleases, but— In fact, these people are never spoken of for three consecutive sentences without a qualification. A disagreeable thing is distinguished from an impertinence, which it often closely resembles, by certain marks. In the first place, an impertinence we need not stand, but the other we often must, aware that it is the result of certain conditions of our friend's mind, which, as we cannot hope to alter, we must resign ourselves to. An impertinence may or may not be true,—its main design, independent of truth, is, more or less, to insult. It is of the essence of a disagreeable thing that it should be true—true in itself, or true as representing the speaker's state of feeling. And yet an unpalatable truth is not technically a disagreeable thing any more than an impertinence, though, of course, the being told it is an unpleasant operation. It is necessary for us now and then to hear unpalatable and unwelcome truths; but a disagreeable thing is never a moral necessity—it is spoken to relieve the speaker's mind, not to profit the hearer. The same utterance may be an impertinence, an unpalatable truth, or a disagreeable thing, according to time and circumstance. For example, in a fit of absence, we perpetrate some solecism in dress or behavior. It is an unwelcome truth to be told it, while there is yet opportunity for remedy, or partial remedy: it is an impertinence to be informed of it by a stranger who has no right to concern himself with our affairs: it is a disagreeable thing when—the occasion past—our friend enlightens us about it, simply as a piece of information. We all of us, no doubt, have friends, relations, and acquaintances who think it quite a sufficient reason for saying a thing, that it is true. Probably we have ourselves known the state of mind in which we find a certain fact or opinion a burden, a load to be got rid of; and, under the gross mistake that all truth must be spoken, that it is uncandid and dangerous not to deliver a testimony—convinced that truth, like murder, will out, and that our friend, sooner or later, must learn the unacceptable fact—we come to the conclusion that it is best for all parties to get the thing over by being ourself the executioner. We have most of us acted the enfant terrible at some time or other. But this crude simplicity of candor, where it is the result of the mere blind, intrusive assertion of truth, is a real weight; and the primary law of politeness, never to give unnecessary pain, as soon as it is apprehended, is welcomed as a deliverer. Children and the very young have not experience enough for any but the most limited sympathy, and can only partially compare the feelings of others with their own. Indeed, the idea of the comparison does not occur to them. But there are people who, in this respect, remain children all their days, and very awkward children too—who burst with a fact as the fool with his secret, and, like the hair-dresser in Leech's caricature, are impelled to tell us that our hair is thin at the top, though nothing whatever is to come of the communication. These, as Sydney Smith says, turn friendship into a system of lawful and unpunishable impertinence, from, so far as we can see, no worse cause than incontinence of fact and opinion,—feeling it to be a sufficient and triumphant defence of every perpetration of the sort, that it is true. "Why did you tell Mr. So-and-so that his sermon was fifty minutes long?" "Because I had looked at my watch." "Why did you remind such a one that he is growing fat and old?" "Because he is." "Why repeat that unfavorable criticism?" "I had just read it." "Why disparage this man's particular friends?" "I don't like them." "Why say to that young lady that her dress was unbecoming?" "I really thought so." It is, however, noticeable in persons of this obtrusive candor, that they have eyes for blemishes only. They are never impelled to tell pleasant truths,—from which, no doubt, we may infer a certain acerbity of temper, though these strictures may be spoken in seeming blunt, honest good-humor. Still, they talk in this way from natural obtuseness and inherent defect of sympathy. These are the people who always hit upon the wrong thing to say, and instinctively ferret out sore subjects. They are not the class we have in our thoughts. Indeed, they incapacitate themselves for serious mischief, as their acquaintance give them a wide berth, and take care not to expose their more cherished interests to their tender mercies. It requires some refinement of perception to say the more pungent and penetrating disagreeable things. We must care for the opinion or the regard of a person whose sayings of this sort can keenly annoy us. A man must have made friends before he can wound them. A real expert in this art is never rude, and can convey a disregard approaching to contempt for another's opinion, hit him in his most vulnerable points, and send him off generally depressed and uncomfortable, without saying a word that can be fairly taken hold of.

Songs of the Soldiers, arranged and edited by Frank Moore. 12mo., pp. 318. New York: George P. Putuam; San Francisco: A. Roman & Co. 1864.

This little volume is uniform with the red, white and blue series edited by Frank Moore. As the book claims merely to exhibit those songs that are most popular with our brave boys, either through association or peculiar musical adaptability, there is no attempt to make the literary excellence of this collection a prominent feature. Some of the "songs" are very clever. We extract the following, perhaps already familiar to many of our readers, as a specimen-brick of the collection:

PADDY ON SAMBO AS A SOLDIER.

Some tell us 't is a burning shame
To make the naygurs fight;
An' that the thrade of bein' kilt
Belongs but to the white;
But as for me, upon my sowl!
So liberal are we here,
I 'll let Sambo be murdered in place of myself
On every day in the year!
On every day in the year, boys,
And every hour in the day,
The right to be killed I'll divide wid him,
An' divil a word I 'll say.

In battle's wild commotion
I shouldn't at all object
If Sambo's body should stop a ball
That was comin' for me direct;
And the prod of a Southern bagnet,
So liberal are we here,
I 'll resign and let Sambo take it
On every day in the year!
On every day in the year, boys,
And wid none of your nasty pride,
All my right in a Southern bagnet prod
Wid Sambo I 'll divide.

The men who object to Sambo
Should take his place and fight;
And it 's better to have a naygur's hue
Than a liver that's wake an' white;
Though Sambo's black as the ace of spades,
His finger a thrigger can pull,
And his eye runs straight on the barrel-sights
From under his thatch of wool!
So hear me all, boys, darlings,
Don't think I'm tippin' you chaff,
Tho right to be killed I'll divide wid him,
And give him the largest half!

"Their Majesties' Servants." Annals of the English Stage from Thomas Betterton to Edmund Kean, Actors, Authors, Audiences. By Dr. Doran, F. S. A. 2 vols. 8v., pp. 416–416. New York: W. J. Widdleton. San Francisco: Roman & Co.

Extracts from this admirable work have from time to time appeared in the English and Eastern journals. It is a full and complete record of the dramatic stage from the days of Thomas Betterton to Edmund Kean, with allusions to cotemporaneous events, which give it the importance and dignity of history. Dr. Doran's style is original and charming; the descriptions are vivid, and the reader cannot help absorbing some of the enthusiasm and genial interest with which the author treats his subject. We can only find room this week for the following description of

THE LAST HOURS OF PEG WOFFINGTON.

She returned to the "Garden" in the season 1754–5, going through all her best characters in that, and the two succeeding, and her final seasons. The last male part she acted was "Lothario;" the last original part she created was "Lady Randolph," (which, however, had been previously played in Edinburgh by Mrs. Ward,) and in "Rosalind," paralysis put an end to her professional career. Just previously, her "Lothario" had not been highly esteemed; and Barry, in the memorable suit of white-puckered satin, had produced all the effect in Douglas. This affected her spirits. Then she was annoyed at young Tate Wilkinson, whom Foote had just brought on the stage, and who had audaciously imitated the worst parts of Margaret's voice. Almost the only unkind act that can be laid to Mrs. Woffington's charge, was her consequent attempt to induce Rich not to enter into an engagement with Wilkinson. Her scorn drove the unfortunate young gentleman, for his story was a sad one, from the green-room, despite the interference of Shuter. One night, as she was playing "Clarissa," in the Confederacy, she saw Wilkinson in a stage-box with Capt. Forbes, and unable to control her rage, she came close to the box, and absolutely made him shrink back by the sneering sarcasm with which she flung at him one of her speeches. A rude woman in the box above mimicked her peculiar voice so well, as "Clarissa" turned away, that Mrs. Woffington thought it came from Wilkinson. That night she swept through the green-room, a beautiful fury, and the next day, at Rich's levee, she assailed Tate with terrible eloquence, prophesied evil to him, wished the evil she prophesied, and altogether manifested little of the kindly nature which was, in truth, her own.

Soon followed thereon the fatal 3d of May, 1757. The play was As You Like It, in which she acted "Rosalind." Young Tate Wilkinson was standing at the wing as she passed on to the stage, and on her way she complimented him, ironically, on his recent success as a debutant. Wilkinson watched and studied her throughout the piece, till she came off early in the fifth act, and suddenly complained of being ill. Wilkinson offered his arm, leaning on which she retired to the green-room, rallied, went on, changed her dress, again trod the stage, defiantly of fate, and again yielded to the coming blow; but only for a moment. Once more she recovered, her self-will being so great, and she began the lines of the epilogue. She had just uttered, with fearful gayety, the words: "If I were among you, I'd kiss as many of you as had beards that pleased me——." when that once saucy tongue became paralyzed. A last flash of courage impelled her to an attempt to proceed; but it was vain, and at the sense that she was stricken, she flung up her hands, uttered a wild shriek in abject terror, and staggering towards the stage-door, fell into the arms stretched to receive her: and amid indescribable confusion of cheering and commiserating cries, Margaret Woffington disappeared from the stage, forever.

In November of that year, a fine gentleman asked, "What has become of Mrs. Woffington?" "She has been taken off by Colonel Cæsar," answered another fine gentleman. "Reduced to aut Cæsar aut nullus," said the smart Lord Tyrawley. "She is gone to be married," said Kitty Clive; "Colonel Cæsar bought the license at the same time Colonel Mostyn bought his." At this time, poor Margaret, in the meridian of her beauty, somewhat weary of her calling, ashamed, it is said, of her life, was slowly dying at "Teddington, in Twickenhamshire," as Walpole loved to call it. So slowly, that the end did not come till 1760.

NOTES OF MINES AND MINERALOGY.

The New Metal Indium.—This metal was discovered by Messrs. Reich and Richter, who have lately communicated to the scientific journals their observations upon its nature and most prominent qualities. A quantity of black blende or zinc ore from the Himmelfahrt mine, on treatment with hydrochloric acid and subsequent evaporation, gave about 43 lbs. of impure chloride of zinc, which, after treatment with water, left a residue containing Indium, from which a few grammes of the new element were obtained.

The metal can be reduced from the oxide by fusion in a carbon crucible with carbonate of soda and borax, and refusion with cyanide of potassium; by fusing alone with the cyanide, the oxide is reduced, but to pulverulent metallic powder. The density of two specimens gave, respectively, 7.11 and 7.14. The color of the metal is between tin and silver white; it is exceedingly soft and very ductile, and retains its metallic lustre when exposed to the air or immersed in water. It easily fuses on charcoal before the blowpipe, coloring the flame blue, and covering the charcoal with a coating which is dark yellow while hot, and white when cold. The oxide imparts no color to the fluxes; when flamed with borax it gives a white enamel; with a salt of phosphorus and tin, a gray pearl.

The metal is slowly soluble by hydrochloric and sulphuric acids when cold, heat increasing the rapidity of the solution. It dissolves rapidly in nitric acid, even when cold and diluted. When dissolved in acetic acid it is precipitated completely by sulphuretted hydrogen as sulphide of indium, which is of a fine yellow color that becomes, on drying, nut-brown, and when pulverized, an orange color. The most striking property of the new metal, and the one which led to its discovery, is the indigo-blue line which it shows in the spectroscope, thus affording another evidence of the great value and delicate character of this mode of analysis in detecting the presence of metals when existing in almost infinitessimal quantity and utterly beyond the reach of the usual analytical tests.

Ore Crushing Machinery.—It is a matter of great practical account in mining to have simple, durable and effective means of breaking up and reducing to small fragments the ores as they come from the mine in large masses or blocks, preparatory to passing them to the pulverizer where they are ground to a powder fine enough to allow the extraction of the metal they may contain. It has been found of great economy to adopt this first step in the working of ores, but only in late years and very slowly has its value been acknowledged even in mining establishments under the most able administration. The fact is now beyond question, as statistics show a saving or, its equivalent, an increased product of 25 to 30 per cent. due to machine crushing.

Most of the best machines designed for this purpose are American, and of these the larger number are of California invention, to a few of which attention will be briefly called.

Blake's stone and ore cracker was the first of its class, and is now used extensively in mines, though for a number of years applied only to the preparation of stone for roads, etc. It is constructed with two jaws of great strength, one fixed, the other movable, and deriving its motion from suitable machinery, and the ore is broken by the action of the movable upon the fixed jaw. Hundreds of these machines have been manufactured and sold in the last two years by an eminent foundry firm in Leeds, England, where they seem to have been more highly valued and appreciated by the mining proprietors than in America, the place of their origin.

Next in order may be mentioned Brodie's crushing machine, of San Francisco, constructed about four years ago; and Hanscom's, of the same place, only invented and put in operation in the last four months. Both are excellent in design, and give most satisfactory results, and in one essential, probably the main point of construction, are the same as Blake's—the ore being crushed by the approach to or action of a movable jaw upon another jaw which is fixed and rigid, the mechanical means whereby this is accomplished being in each somewhat varied and but slightly different in form.

While omitting to speak of other machines of this kind, but in no spirit of neglect, and far from any feeling of condemnation, allusion must, in justice, be made here to the crusher of Mr. Fauchery, of this city, which is known as the Crocodile Crusher, and so called from the fact that both jaws in this machine are made to move after the manner of the animal from which it takes its name. This machine is extremely simple, consisting in the main of only three pieces of rough cast iron of great strength. It does its work thoroughly, with but a small consumption of power and with a steady, easy motion.

In all these rock-breaking machines it never fails to strike the observer with wonder, exciting his admiration—sometimes fear—to see masses of the most compact, obdurate rock thus give out sparks of fire at every blow of the sledge, that structure the work of the most powerful forces known in nature, in an instant broken up, disintegrated and made to crumble into dust by the hand of man.

Antimony—Improved Mode of Treating it.—In the southern districts of the State of California antimonial ore is found in abundance, and of very high quality, but by reason of the great distance from a shipping point, and in the absence of good roads, which makes the transportation slow and costly, the mines of this metal have not yet received from miners and men of means the attention they justly deserve. It has been found too expensive to work the ores on the ground by the old method of reducing these ores; little was expected from them till some new and cheaper mode could be devised. This seems to have been done in Australia, as fine specimens of 100 lbs. weight of metallic antimony have been recently exhibited in Melbourne from a process patented some short time ago by the Rev. Edward Hughes, of Heathcote. This invention is likely to lead to important results, as it is more expeditious and simple than the old process, in which two or more smeltings have been used to procure the metal in its requisite purity. Mr. Hughes accomplishes the result in one operation, by means of a close furnace. A smelting company has been formed at Victoria in that colony, and with their present apparatus they weekly reduce fifteen tons of ore, containing from 60 to 70 per cent. of metal. This ore is obtained at a cost of about £5 per ton, and when reduced to metal is worth £40 per ton in England. In reducing it to the metallic form at the mines, by this new method, the large cost of freight is avoided, and the mines, otherwise unavailable, and made valuable to their owners and the colony. These ores, like many of the California ores of antimony, contain gold, which is separated by proper treatment at the mines or sold in alloy with the metallic antimony, and its value accounted for in the proceeds of sale.

Balzac is Shy.—There is a pleasant story of how the great Balzac was confined for a week in the Hotel des Haricots, the disciplinary prison of the National Guard.

In the height of his popularity, Balzac, like Beranger, sought to avoid visitors. To this end he hired rooms under the assumed name of Mme. Dupont. To which place Leon Gozlan, who discovered his retreat, once addressed a letter—

A Madame Dupont
"(née Balzac)."

At this time the great novelist served in the National Guard, which institution he held in horror, and he believed that by hiding he should relieve himself of his odious duty; but civil-military law knows no respect for persons, and at his recognized home the proper authorities had "filed" all the summonses and orders that precede the incarceration of refractory and inattentive national guardsmen. Of these, of course, Mme. Dupont knew nothing.

The sergeant-major of the company which had the honor of inscribing De Balzac on its muster-roll was by trade a hair-dresser and perfumer. Enraged at the illustrious writer for his revelation of several of the inner secrets of hair-dressery and perfumery in his novel of "Cesar Birotteau," the military barber resolved to avenge the "trade" and the troop. All that he wanted was to catch the novelist in the street, for domicile is inviolable.

One morning, while Balzac was writing one of his wonderful "Incarnations de Vautrin," his servant entered his study and informed him that a box containing an Etruscan vase had just arrived below; that the porter, after three days' search, had discovered that M. de Balzac was staying chez Mme. Dupont. Inspired by curiosity and love of the artistic, the great author ran down stairs in his dressing-gown. A man, carrying a case, stood at the door. Balzac stepped into the street.

"Trapped!" cried the sergeant-major perruquier, at the same moment avenging his own art and his prisoner's want of patriotism.

Away went the sham porter and the sham box. In vain Balzac pointed to his robe-de-chambre and slippers. The barber-sergeant was inexorable. A crowd assembled, and the author of the Comedie Humaine was marched off.

Not Exactly Plain Enough.—A recently married gentleman was heard to declare that he was then as happy as the day was long. Rather unfortunately, however, he happened to be speaking on the 21st of December.

THE FIRST MEETING OF SIR LAUNCELOT AND QUEEN GUINIVERE.

THE Lady Guinevere was crown'd,
And all Prince Arthur's Table Round
Their fealty came to yield.
She sat, the very fairest queen
That England's realm had ever seen,
Beside the bravest king, I ween,
E'er handled weapon sharp and keen
Or sceptre learn'd to wield.

The golden circlet jewell'd rare
Shone through the wealth of braided hair
That wreathed her perfect head;
With crimson robe and snowy vest,
And gems on arms and rounding breast,
It seem'd to every knightly guest
To be a hope supremely blest
For her his blood to shed.

As one by one their bearded lips
Just press'd her slender finger-tips,
In token of their zeal,
She bore her part with regal grace,
That show'd the throne was fitting place
For blood of Leodegraunce's race;
And who before such peerless face
Would hesitate to kneel?

But when, unhelmeted and tall,
Sir Launcelot trode across the hall
And bow'd before the throne,
A sudden meeting of their eyes
Quick caused the eddying blood to rise,
To flush her cheek with richer dyes,
Each echoing the other's sighs,
As his hand touch'd her own.

And thus, an instant, all forgot
Was royal mien and queenly lot
In joy of passion's birth;
The heart-pulse leapt through all her frame,
Love's dawning broke in rosy flame
Of blushing clouds that went and came
As Launcelot vow'd henceforth her name
Should be his star on earth!

A moment, and the spell was o'er:
The woman was a queen once more,
And Launcelot, loyal knight;
But ever through that festal day,
Mid tournament or mock-melée,
Their glances caught each other's ray;
And Arthur praised her that alway
Her blushes were so bright!—[Sallie Bridges.

THE AVDENTURES OF A LADY IN SEARCH OF A HORSE.

CHAPTER IV.

CONCLUSION.

"SHY she was, and I thought her cold,
Proud, and I fled o'er the sea;
Filled I was with folly and spite,
While Ellen Adair was dying for me."

IN treating of Gloriana and her "adventures," I must plead guilty to having hitherto bestowed more attention on the horses, with which she was from time to time so artfully saddled, than on the young lady herself. And to repair so serious an error, I will proceed to give a description of my heroine, now (through the agency of Sir Erasmus, and those various steeds, good, bad, and indifferent,) in the possession of glowing health, and of all the charms with which Nature had in her case been unusually lavish. She was, indeed, a beautiful girl; and she had also the great, and not very common advantage, of being very diffident and modest on the score of her own attractions. She had lived so secluded a life, with little or no society but that of her mother and sister, that she had not found the opportunity generally afforded to a girl of her age, of testing the value of their own beauty by the judgment of the world of men. And yet hers was a face that no one could pass, without longing to gaze again and again upon its rare and perfect loveliness. It had the charm and fascination which an ever-varying expression alone can give. Animated or shy, merry or thoughtful, the countenance was in every changing mood the reflex and image of the pure and ingenuous mind. Her eyes, of a deep violet, shaded by their dark lashes, were and as eyes should be, they were the most attractive feature of her face. Her hair was luxuriant in quantity and rich in color; her figure lithe and slender, and, now that she had recovered her health, upright as a dart, and indicative of the strength combined with slightness which can alone be productive of genuine grace. "She does look well on horseback," had been the remark of all who had seen her, even on the sorry mounts—with the exception of poor Taffy—with which she had hitherto been accommodated.

I observed above that Gloriana had had as yet, no opportunity of testing the power of her own attractions over the hearts of the other sex; one, however, there had been who would have proved neither indifferent nor disloyal to them, had he received but the slighest encouragement from the lips of his youthful enslaver. The young Squire, Ralph Levison—who had become master of the Park, since the death of a distant relative, and who resided there with his sister, Miss Levison, a good-natured but weak single woman of a certain age—no sooner saw Gloriana, in her white dress and garden hat, pruning her roses at the "Cottage," which was situated within the boundaries of his own Park, than he fell desperately in love with the fair vision, and, acting upon the spur of an ingenuous nature, he lost little time in making his devotion apparent. At this stage of the proceedings, however, his ardor received a check; Gloriana was very shy, and she also possessed a great deal of that comparatively rare quality, maidenly dignity, and being conscious in her own heart of a dawning partiality for their handsome neighbor and landlord she thought it incumbent upon her to be less cordial and genial with him, than she would have been to a more commonplace and indifferent acquaintance. This line of conduct became more marked, in consequence of the garrulous twaddle of Miss Levison, the maiden sister, who was continually impressing upon the minds of "the girls at the Cottage," that "her brother was looked upon as the catch of the country;" and that the advances which were made to him by mothers on the part of their daughters, and even by the daughters themselves, were absolutely "shocking." "Shocking," indeed, was Miss Levison's favorite condemnatory interjection; and according to her own account the revulsions to which her delicate organization was subjected, in the course of one day, must have been serious and overwhelming. She was very fond of talking of her brother, and, indeed, the whole affection of which she was capable was concentrated in him; but owing to the natural love of deception and misrepresentation, to which all women who gossip are more or less subject, she managed to do him more mischief, in a matter which affected his happiness, than she was at all aware of. He was young, ardent, and impulsive, and, stung by the coldness of Gloriana's manner, he wished by some sudden attack to surprise her into emotion of one sort or another. He had with this intention enlisted his sister in his service, or rather believed that he had enlisted her, and that she had understood the real motive, in the proposal he had made to her of going abroad with him for six months—a proposal which had concluded with a faltering—"in case." "You will be going down to the Cottage this evening," he added, after a pause; "you can just mention our plans to them. I want to know particularly what they think of it—what she thinks of it I mean," he said, raising his head with manly candor—he was not ashamed of his devotion, why should he disguise or deny it? "I will come in later and bring you home!" Surely this was clear enough, and yet this delicate commission, which a clever woman not interested in the result, one way or another, would have managed in the most natural manner in the world, was so wofully bungled in the hands of Miss Levison, who was interested perhaps in the non-success of her brother's suit, that it ended in the worst way possible for all parties interested or concerned in the matter. For when the Squire "dropped in" at the Cottage on that lovely summer's afternoon, in the hope of meeting with an inquiring or even reproachful glance from the violet eyes of the maiden whom he loved so ardently, he was not even favored with their usual half-shy, half-conscious acknowledgment of his presence; but observed that they were steadily fixed in an opposite and apparently singularly unattractive direction. A cloud seemed to hang, indeed, over the spirits of the party: and while Mrs. Applegarde entertained her hearers with a story that had no beginning, and which did not seem likely to come to an end, two hearts which were struggling with the strength of their own emotions, had time to settle down into that cold and unlovely reticence—which might be compared to the placing of a mental Chubb's lock, upon all the outlets of expression in the soul—so that two statues of stones, could not have revealed less than did the inanimate forms of those whose destinies were trembling in the balance of fate. Ralph was the first to endeavor to place things on a more genial footing between himself, and his fair tenants of the Cottage. "What do you think of our plan for going abroad during the summer and autumn, Miss Applegarde?" he said, as he joined her suddenly in a shrubbery walk, whither she had wandered, as he fondly hoped, to allow him a "last appeal." The words were simple ones; but Gloriana was woman enough to know all that they implied. Raising her beautiful eyes, however, coldly and calmly into her lover's face, she merely replied, "I think it is a very good one." Then there was a short pause; it never occurred to either of them that "some one might have blundered" in the delicate commission, with which that some one had been so confidingly intrusted. An open explanation, a few kind words, and all might have been well; but in such cases the explanation is never made—the kind word never bestowed. Gloriana's heart was on the point of relenting, as she saw something glitter for a moment in Ralph Levison's eyes; but she was too late—the words she had said could not be recalled; she had accepted that cruel plan, at which her soul rebelled, as "a very good one," and the thing was done. With a powerful effort, he, too, mastered the emotion which had sharply stung his strong heart, and stretching out his hand, had said, "Thank you, Gloriana; you have done your best to cure me of my love for you. I will not harass you any more—good-by;" and before she was aware, he had raised her hand to his lips, and kissed it passionately. After that short interview, when he was gone whom she had loved well, although unconsciously, she thought of the tear that she had seen glittering in his eyes, and knowing what it must have cost him, the remembrance of it poisoned the sources of her life. She pined and drooped, and nobody knew what ailed her; but the shrewed London doctor, who read her secret at a glance, and who ordered her at once, as a remedy, something to do, something to think of—and, better than all, something that, above all other things, something that he took an interest in. This last clause was of course nothing more than a lucky hit—even the shrewd doctor's powers of clairvoyance did not reach so far into a mill-stone as that. The "exercise upon four legs" had, indeed, turned out a sovereign remedy; for Gloriana had begun to rally from the day that she had her first ride upon the kicking cob. Perhaps a letter received from abroad not long afterwards, from the repentant maiden sister might have had something to do with her further recovery. "We take a great interest," it said, "in everything concerning your riding. Ralph wants you to have the Welsh pony, which, he says, is quite quiet, and would carry you beautifully," etc., etc.; for Ralph had heard that she was ill, and had forgiven even that cruel aquiescence with regard to the advantages of their foreign trip. After these revelations, the reader will not be surprised, that the visit to the Park was an agitating one to Gloriana. It seemed so like "seeking him," she thought, "and yet it must be done because of poor Taffy—and my foolish pride deserves some punishment: it serves me right."

Ralph Levison was proud also; but he was too generous and manly to let his pride interfere with his feelings of deference towards women—particularly towards unprotected women, like the widow and her two daughters. He was, therefore, on his way to the Cottage, as the sisters were on their way to the Park; and as they exchanged a warm, but rather shy greeting, Gloriana raised her tearful eyes to his face, and said, "Oh! Mr. Levison, I do not know what to say to you, or how to meet you—poor Taffy is dead. I killed him."

"You killed him?" repeated Mr. Levison, after her; but it would appear as if the pony's death had scarcely affected him to the extent which it ought to have done, for Gloriana was in no haste to remove her hand from his, and if her manner was shy, there was no trace of pride or coldness now.

"Yes, I killed him," she replied, solemnly; "I gave him too much corn, and brought on inflammation, and I am as sorry that he died, as if he had been my brother."

"I am glad of it, Gloriana, if our quarrel is to be made up over his grave."

"Oh! you must not be glad, indeed you must not," was the eager reply; "our quarrel was made up long before, and you must not be glad that poor Taffy died."

Just at that moment Ralph Levison had no other wish but to be glad or sorry, as she was glad or sorry, in whom his heart delighted. It was the happiest moment of his life, and I fear that the memory of Taffy was like a pleasant essence in his nostrils, since it had thrown down the icy barriers of coldness and pride, which had been built up between himself and Gloriana, and established their friendship on the old footing of candor and genial unreserve. From that day there were no more misunderstandings, no more intrusting of important missions to the fatal third party, who invariably bungles in a love affair. Gloriana had found out, through bitter experience, that her own happiness was bound up in that of Ralph Levison's, and he had long been aware of the truth, that his depended entirely upon her; so as a natural consequence, before a week had gone over their heads, it was one of those widely diffused secrets, that every one knows, that the young Squire and Miss Applegarde were engaged to be married

Miss Levison had unwillingly made up her mind, at last, that it must come to this; and tried to persude herself that she had had her brother's happiness at heart, even when she had informed Gloriana, on the important evening described above, that her brother had made up his mind to go abroad, because he was so persecuted by the matrimonial snares which mothers and daughters were laying for his bachelorhood in the county. It was a good trait in her future sister's character, that, although often reproached by her now happy lover, for the cruel coldness of the words which had driven him from her side, she never betrayed his sister's treachery to him; but, on the contrary, did everything in her power to conciliate her, and make her feel as little as possible the difference in position, which her brother's wife would have it in her power to make, if so inclined. 'Let by-gones be by-gones,' she would say, gravely, when the subject was bruited; "and tell me, Ralph, what am I to ride to-day—Birdseye, or War Eagle, or Hetty, or The O'Donoghue?" for there was hardly a horse in the Park stables, that Gloriana had not mounted and ridden, under the auspices of her sporting squire.

"I have ordered War Eagle for you to-day, if you will promise to ride steadily; but she is getting dreadfully wild," he added, turning to Mrs. Applegarde; "she will beat me across country soon."

"I am not afraid as long as you are with her," was the reply. "I cannot say that I quite liked her cantering about the country, by herself; but James did so set his face against a groom."

"James is a muff," replied the reckless Ralph; "and how he could allow you to be so cheated by that rascal Ned, I can't conceive."

For the stable expenses, during the time of that worthy's reign and rule, had been submitted by Mrs Applegarde to the critical inspection of her future son-in-law. "My dear lady," he had remarked, after running his eye down the items, and arriving at the wonderful total, which the ingenuity of "Knowing Ned" had run up, "all I can say is, that you must have been keeping up a hunting establishment at the Cottage during my absence; how many breakfasts have you given to the hunt? and when did you pay up your last subscription to the hounds?"

"Was it not shameful?" said Gloriana, with her face in a glow. "I could have forgiven him all that, though, if he had not made me believe that I killed Taffy; but that was really sinful."

"Here comes War Eagle," said Kate, who had been on the watch; and the stately horse came stepping like a stag down the Park glade. "He is a real beauty. Oh, Glorry! I envy you your ride to-day, and only wish that I had the courage to get upon a horse's back."

"We must teach you," said her future brother; "but how is it, Kate, that you are such a little coward, when Glorry is afraid of nothing?"

"I remember when she was afraid of you," said Kate, who never missed a favorable opportunity for repartee; "and where is your chair?" she added saucily to her sister, as War Eagle exhibited signs of impatience, and began some stately curvetting at the door, "to help you to get up, you know, as Wells used to say."

Gloriana frowned slightly at the merry girl, to deprecate all chaff in the presence of the grooms, and poising her foot lightly in Ralph's hand, the getting up was easily disposed of; in a second she was in the saddle, and appeasing the impatience of War Eagle by patting him on his glossy neck, and speaking to him low, honeyed words of love and admiration, to which he seemed to listen with the condescension of a prince of the blood. War Eagle was a powerful thorough-bred horse, and as he bounded with long strides over the elastic turf, his nostrils dilated, and his eye flashed, and he looked as if his untamed spirit would prove too much for the girlish form, and slender hands, of his rider to subdue. Equal to the occasion, however, Gloriana's color rose, and eager with excitement and with her own overflowing happiness she exclaimed:

"Oh! let me take him over something, Ralph; you know you promised that I should."

"I don't know," was the reply; "he's pulling you enough as it is; he gets mad sometimes when he thinks that he is to go."

"So do I; let us go together. There is a nice little fence that I used to take Taffy over, just at the end of the glade; just this once, Ralph, please," she added coaxingly, and receiving no positive injunction to the contrary, rode steadily on in the direction of the fence.

"Don't interfere with him," was all the caution she received; "he'll do it himself."

The good horse, indeed, wanted no hint that his rider could give him on the subject; he dropped gently on the other side of the fence, with his fair burden safe on his back.

"Oh, it is glorious!" she exclaimed, as she followed Ralph upon Birdseye, across the open fallow. "Oh! I should enjoy a day with the hounds."

"That is what I was afraid of," said the young Squire, gravely; and he will perhaps be set down as very strait-laced and particular by his sporting brethren, when I admit that, with all his own love of sport, and admiration of courage in men and women, he disliked the idea of seeing young, gentle, refined women habituées of the hunting-field. "That is what I was afraid of," he said; and then he added still more seriously, "Gloriana, you will oblige me very much if you will never ask me to let you hunt—you know I can refuse you nothing."

"I will never mention the subject again, if you dislike it," she replied; "but I thought you would have liked it—that is, if you knew that I could ride." This she said doubtfully, and inquiringly—and feeling herself a novice in the art, she was perhaps a little hurt.

"It is because I think you ride so well, that I should dislike it for you. I could not bear to have you the object of vulgar admiration and comment. Do you understand me, now, Glorry?"

"I do, indeed, and I should dislike it above all things, myself," she said, blushing at the very idea.

"I cannot fancy either you or Kate ever becoming fast young ladies; you would not have believed that of me, perhaps, who am a sportsman to the backbone; but masculine women are my favorite aversion. I should have offered you War Eagle before now," he added; "but he does not come up to my standard of a lady's horse—he requires too much strength for graceful riding."

"He does, indeed," said Gloriana, who had found during the last gallop, that he was rather too much for her; "he is quite quiet, but very hard to hold."

The words were scarcely uttered, before the horse, starting at a man in a hedge-row, broke away with Gloriana, and proceeded with great strides across the open meadow, in the direction of a wide brook that ran through it. He was not going at his full speed, but he was running away, inasmuch as she could not stop him. She did not, however, lose her nerve or her presence of mind; but turning her head, she said to Ralph, who kept a little in the wake, knowing what the horse was when he was collared, "I am not frightened: but I can't hold him. Will he jump the brook?"

"Yes; give him his head, and let him go; then pull him with all your strength, and turn his head towards me."

Gloriana obeyed these instructions carefully, and no sooner found herself safe on the other side, than with a final effort she pulled the horse round, while Birdseye gallantly clearing the brook also, brought Ralph to her rescue, who caught her bridle at once in his firm and secure grasp. The next moment she was lifted gently, but quickly to the ground.

"We must change saddles," Ralph said, his own face pale as death, while Gloriana's was glowing with pleasure and excitement. "You have proved your courage sufficiently now, and your seat too. Well done, Gloriana!" he added, warming now that the fright was over. "You are worthy of your name; that brook has turned half a field of good riders before now."

"Has it?" she replied innocently; "I should like to do it again; it was only like a very long stride."

"No, thank you. I must say that in cold blood I should prefer the bridge," said Ralph, laughing; and as they rode home, he said, "Your adventures in search of a horse have been very amusing, Glorry; but I hope they are nearly over now."

The following day was Gloriana's nineteenth birthday, and this family secret had of course been betrayed to one so nearly interested as Ralph Levison. He had a present in store for the lady of his love, of which she had not the most distant idea. The secret had been well kept, for the simple reason that it had been confided to no one. The young Squire was rich and generous, and it was not likely that would withhold his lavish hand, when money could purchase enjoyment for one he so dearly loved. "My present is the last, but not, in one sense of the word the least," he said, after heartily congratulating the young heroine of the day. "Come to the door, Glorry, and tell me what you think of the Paragon. He's the best that can be found for love or money," only, he added, turning laughingly to Kate, "he won't stand a chair; and if his 'strength lies in his head' it is concentrated into a very small space." This last remark was for the especial benefit of Mr. Wells, who was no longer the only male prop of the Applegarde family. He felt the loss of position severely; but the splendor of the match, which his beloved young mistress was about to make, acted as a balm to his wounded heart; and although he winced a little under the railleries of the Squire, he yielded the palm to him with a pretty good grace, as far, at least, as horses were concerned. There is nothing more to be said of Paragon than that he was perfection, as his name implied. Perfect in his paces, with the courage of a lion and the gentleness of a dove; his mouth, his temper, his shape, his legs, his head, his eyes, his mane, his tail, his color his pedigree—all made him worthy of his name and of his mistress; who, as she turned, in the exuberance of her joy, to thank her lover for his munificent gift, said, "Oh! what a dear old man was Sir Erasmus when he ordered me exercise upon four legs; and what a divine horse was Brutus, who, when he kicked me off on the common, commenced a series of adventures, which have ended," she added, softly, and with eyes beaming with affection, "which have ended in Paragon and you."

Legends of the Tree of Knowledge.—The angel guarding the portals of Paradise gave three pips of the tree of which Adam and Eve had eaten to Seth, who placed them under his father's tongue when he buried him in the valley of Hebron. They sprang up into three saplings, which by the time of Moses had united and become one. It was with that he struck the rock, etc. David also possessed this tree, and, after having performed many wonders with it, planted it in his garden in Jerusalem. Solomon, finding it large and strong, had it cut down for one of the beams of the Temple, but the workmen were unable to make it fit in anywhere. It was ultimately thrown into a pond, where it rose to the surface and formed a bridge. When the Queen of Sheba saw it she told Solomon that One would hang on it who would be the Savior of Adam and all his posterity, which caused him to have it overlaid with gold and silver, and placed over the door of the Temple, that all who entered might bless it. Rehoboam, however, stole it for the sake of the gold and silver, and buried it out of sight. But a well was dug many years afterwards just over the spot, and up came the beam to the surface of the water. This was the pool of Bethseda. As it floated there it was seized by the Jews and fashioned into the cross upon which our Lord was nailed.

The Interior of a Javanese Seraglio.—As no man except the Sultan is permitted within the precincts of the seraglio, I will here insert a description from the pen of my wife, who by the kindness of Mrs. Z——, was enabled to see and converse with these Javanese houries. In a low kind of bungalow, some distance from the main building, not, however, so far off but that we could distinctly hear the sounds of music and mirth from the joyous scene we had just left, were assembled several women, mostly very young, and all dressed in a costly native fashion. Some of the party were playing a Chinese game of cards. All look up on our entrance, but soon resumed their occupation, alternately playing, chewing tobacco, betel, and seri leaf, and using their spittoons, one of which was placed by the side of each person. Most of them were good-looking, with magnificent dark eyes, drooping lids, and long, curling lashes. They make use of an immense quantity of powder, which, though very glaring, probably tends to heighten their charms. Their hair was dressed with care, being all drawn back from the face and arranged in two loops behind, in which chumpaka and molor flowers were inserted by some, whilst others wore diamond pins. The ear was made unnaturally large by immense ear-rings, in shape exactly like a small cotton reel, about the size of one of Clarke's number sixty, the centre of each end being studded with brilliants. The large holes through which these singular ornaments were thrust are bored at a very tender age, and the apertures are filled from time to time with gradually larger and heavier ear-rings, until the lobes finally become so unnaturally elongated. Unfortunately, the beauty of the Javanese in general is spoilt by a prevalence of bad noses. It is very rarely one comes across a good nose, but when that feature is perfect, the face is usually pretty, provided always the mouth is kept closed, for, from the constant use of seri-gambier tobacco, etc., their teeth are very black. This unfortunately is considered a beauty. In children, of thirteen or fourteen, you see frequently beautiful teeth, like rows of pearls, either undergoing, or about to undergo, this disfiguring process. Amidst the group before us, I was most struck by a very young girl, whose age, I thought, could not exceed twelve or thirteen, and from whose face, though she appeared thoughtful, silent, and sad, the childish look had not yet disappeared. Who knew but that the instinct of her heart already told her a better destiny might have been hers than that to which she was probably devoted? She was doubtless intended to be the new toy of a middle-aged monarch, and although she might revolt against her lot, she could do nothing to change it. She was her master's property until he tired of her, and sought new charms. Most of them, however, looked cheerful and happy, and I was told, by one who knew many of them personally, that they are generally content with their lot, being allowed no end of finery and silly amusements. Turning to look at the numerous birds, which hung in cages around, I could not help thinking how true was the comparison which likened these captive minstrels to the poor prisoners who attend to and pet them.—Life in Java, by W. B. D'Almeida.

A Bumper of Ham.—About forty years ago a young foreigner came to spend a winter in London. Although he arrived as a stranger, he held recommendations to some of our first merchants, and was therefore almost unavoidably compelled to mix a good deal in society. All his pleasures, however, were marred by the necessity laid upon him of drinking frequent healths, to which he, being naturally abstemious, had a great dislike. In vain he pleaded to his friends his dislike to wine, or his inability to understand the sentiment pledged, or his ignorance of the merits of the man toasted; his so-called friends persisted in forcing his compliance, and although he never became intoxicated, he took sufficient to inconvenience both body and mind. At last the time arrived for his departure, a day or two previous to which he invited all his friends to a grand entertainment which he provided at one of the best taverns. After the usual succession of courses, when that expressive benignancy began to overspread every countenance, which told that the digestive apparatus of each was comfortably at work, he addressed them thus: "I am sensible of your kindness to a stranger; you have taught me to be generous, and in my way I will try and requite you." He gave a signal and a huge Westphalian ham was placed upon the table, and every guest furnished with a knife and fork. Consternation and surprise appeared upon every face. The foreigner, however, rose unmoved, and cutting off a large slice, he raised it upon his fork, and said, with much solemnity: "The King." His friends endeavored to evade this novel method of showing honor; some declared that they had eaten enough; others, that they loathed ham, and that it would make them ill! "Gentlemen," said their host, "this is not a matter of choice; I shall fine every man a bumper of ham who will not eat to the glory of your excellent monarch. Far be it from me to desire that you should be sick! Have you not, to my great annoyance, compelled me repeatedly to drink to the merits of your great men? Not an orator or a general shall now be forgotten; each shall be honored with his appropriate slice of ham." It need scarcely be said that his disgusted and disappointed guests departed in confusion; but carried with them a subject for reflection from which they might draw some profitable conclusions.

Hints to Composition.—We strive to imitate in exact proportion as we admire; and the authors we read most we do almost unwittingly make our models. It is necessary, therefore, as a qualifier, that we mingle other reading therewith in its due proportion, and acquaint ourselves, as far as our time will allow, with all those writers who are entitled to be called, par excellence, the "standard authors." If we are desirous of forming a style which shall be peculiarly our own, we must either read a great deal, or else not read at all. It is remarkable how poor comparatively our every-day speech is, and how little use we make of the rich stores the English language contains. It is computed that the English tongue includes about 40,000 words, leaving out participles, and ultra-scientific or technical words. Most persons of some education in speaking and writing seldom use more than 2,000 or 3,000. In the lower orders of society we find a still greater poverty of expression. It has been shown that amongst agricultural laborers the number used and found sufficient for their manner of life is frequently only some 300 or 400.

Swiss Scenes and Sites—While hunting after scenes and sites, it will be wise to take warning by the fatal accidents which occur amidst the Alps almost every summer. Switzerland occupies a certain small space on the map of Europe; but practically, Switzerland is duplicate. There are two Switzerlands, the upper and the lower, the accessible and the hard of access; Switzerland on earth and Switzerland in the clouds. The one may be agreeably journeyed through by ladies, elderly folk and quiet people in general; the other is the haunt of chamois-hunters and members of the Alpine Club. Still there is an attractive mid-region (allowing a near approach to and a closer view of forbidden spots and unattainable wonders,) which may be visited without imprudence by persons who will relinquish perilous ascents and passages which, even if accomplished, lead to no useful results, either practical or scientific, but merely add to the tourist's capital of brag. Very good indications to those wilder and yet not too hazardous scenes are given in Badeker's excellent manual. They are well worth seeing; for description fails to give any adequate conception of the effect of grand mountain scenery. While gazing at it, you experience a combination of sensual gratification to the eye and intellectual excitement to the mind, which can be no more described in words than certain tasters or certain bodily sensations. The rocky wilderness is often rendered comfortable by the wooden hotels, which are on the increase. Some of them are by no means small; they are not houses, but three-decker arks, built to remain on dry land instead of floating. They are ships which are not prisons, and where there is no chance of being drowned. The rooms are cabins, separated from the other cabins by wooden partitions; the ceilings are diaphragms of wood. Though you do not hear the sea-waves splash, you may often listen to the waters rushing and the winds roaring in the rigging aloft, i. e., in the broad expanse of roof, weathercocks and spouts. These arks, too, are ballasted, like other vessels, with the difference that the load of stones is placed aloft instead of in the hold, without fear of making the ship capsize. Amongst the Alps, there is nothing like wood; everything (except tea-kettles and frying pans) is supposed capable of being made of wood. Wooden houses, with wooden walls and wooden roofs, shelter men who eat with wooden spoons and forks, and whose virtues are recorded on wooden grave-stones. A Swiss dandy will even show his patriotism by wearing wooden buttons on his Sunday clothes. When the carriage-road ceases in the Alps, there are two safe ways of travelling farther: on foot and in chairs carried by relays of men. The latter is expensive, and will hardly be employed for long distances. Saddle-horses and mules are to be had in plenty. They will often carry you well and safely, but will occasionally fail you at the most critical point, especially if you are not used to their ways and weaknesses. When the streams of tourists is at its fullest rush, a horse which has performed a fair journey in harness, and has been so employed for weeks, with no rest but rainy days, will be taken out of a carriage, fitted with a saddle, and forthwith placed at your service. What can you expect from such a hack as that?—London Society.

A Fight with a Black Snake.—An eastern paper says: We invite the attention of naturalists to the remarkable incidents described in the little story that follows, which we pen ourselves, though not giving it the honors of leaded type. It comes from a friend, a native of Connecticut, who has recently returned from a sojourn at New Hartford in that State. In his boyhood, he tells us, a legend obtained in his portion of the State, to the effect that a large black snake haunted a plot of ground in the neighborhood, and was in the habit of chasing and frightening man or woman who ventured upon his domain after nightfall. The reptile was said to be one of the genus vulgarly known as the "racer," which is marked by a single ring of light color. The locality, of which we have to do, was an uncultivated waste lying within half a mile of the town above named, and the favorite resort of blackberrying parties. Remembrance of the legend of his youth was brought very singularly to our friend's mind, before his visit was ended.

One morning two or three weeks ago, Mr. Barker, a good and most trustworthy inhabitant of New Hartford, was returning from the Rule Factory at Hitchcoxville at a very early hour, so that as he drew near home the day was dawning. By way of making a short cut, he took his course through the ground in question; and, while stopping for a moment therein, he was suddenly assailed by a snake that he judged to be not less than eight feet in length. The creature threw itself upon him, made three or four coils of itself round his legs, and drew back its head and threw out its tongue, with a menacing gesture, but without any attempt to bite. The contraction and pressure of the coils were so severe that Mr. Barker, not a young man by any means and taken unaware, was thrown off his balance, lost his footing, and actually fell on his side. He contrived, however, on recovering himself, to pull out his jack-knife, and became in turn the assailant. He did not succeed in killing the "racer," but inflicted sundry cuts upon it. The contest did not last long; the snake not relishing cold steel, unwound itself and made off. Mr. Barker was unbitten, nor, as we have said, was he conscious of any attempt to bite him. The attack, nevertheless, so hideous and extraordinary, quite unnerved him; and he was ill from its effects two or three days. Among his neighbors, Mr. Barker's veracity does not admit of a moment's doubt; and we therefore narrate this "snake story" as an actual occurrence.

Is it not strange, that a snake of comparatively small size should adopt the mode of attack in use by the great boa constrictor of other lands? Are naturalists aware of this habit? Is this the ordinary mode in which the creature secures its prey?

Speaking of "last words," the finest expression we ever knew as uttered by a dying man, was that of the stage-driver in California, a few years ago. Several friends, drivers like himself, were standing by his bedside. "Boys," said he, feebly, "I'm on the down grade and can't reach the brake!" and died.—Humboldt Register.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1864.

THE NEWS.

THE election is over. The only revolution recognized by the Constitution of the United States culminated on Tuesday night, and what was really the conservative principle of our Government triumphed over the radical element of change. There can be but little doubt, from the returns that are already coming in, that Abraham Lincoln has been re-elected to the position he has occupied for the last four years, with the prospect of becoming what Mr. Seward thought he might reasonably claim to be—President of the United States. The majorities that are hourly clicked off by the telegraph only make this devoutly-wished-for consummation the more probable. The people have passed through a terrible struggle, in which they have had to combat not only the antagonism of the rebellion but their own vices and weaknesses. The greatest of all victories—that achieved by a nation over itself—on Tuesday last passed into the history of civilization. In many respects the story of 1860 was but repeated. Another uprising of the people took place, and the Republic was again redeemed. Our country never stood more gloriously before the world than she stands to-day. Our first struggle was one of self-defence, and only against organized and sectional traitors with arms in their hands. The second with a more subtle element—the weak and faint-hearted of our own party, the avaricious and grasping; unscrupulous and disappointed politicians, and the cravens whose sympathies only policy had repressed. The Administration had made many enemies—a few perhaps had just wrongs to avenge—but they foolishly permitted themselves to forget those that might have been individually remedied to make a common and unjust cause that could not prevail without the sacrifice of the nation's honor. The South must accept the decision of this election as a proof of the undivided will of the North. The day of compromises is forever past. Nothing remains now but the bitter arbitrament, which the misguided slaveholders themselves evoked in their attempt to link their peculiar institution to the car of civilization, or the complete abandonment of their claims. As far as we can learn, the election was singularly quiet and peaceful. Even New York, who has tasted blood before, and who, with her large admixture of foreign element, has turbulent fires seething in the core of her mighty system, rejected Fernando Wood, without a struggle. How far Gen. Butler and his ten thousand soldiers tended to produce this repose the reader will imagine.

The war news is meagre; the telegraph has been pre-occupied with the details of our more peaceful triumphs. The pirate Florida has been sunk by the Wachusetts in Brazilian waters; a somewhat delicate question of international law will probably engage Mr. Seward's attention. However the question be adjudicated it will not raise the sunken pirate, and merchantmen will profit by the "armistice." Report says that Sherman has destroyed Atlanta by fire, sent his supplies to Chattanooga and is now marching on Charleston with 40,000 men. A glance at the map does not disclose the plan very clearly to the civilian's mind, but it is supposed that some new and startling changes in the campaign are thus foreshadowed. With this general clearing up of the sky, the gold barometer has not been consulted, and no quotations have reached us since the election.

THE ELECTION IN THIS CITY.

THE peace and quiet preserved throughout this city during the election of Tuesday, was one of the most remarkable aspects of that eventful day. The occasion was one which offered a favorable pretext for outbreak and riot, and the temper of even the most law-abiding citizens were feverishly excited. Nothing but the admirable and thorough preparation of the Police authorities and the consciousness of the disaffected that any attempt on their part would cause the offended majesty of the law to sweep them from the polls in a whirlwind, prevented an emeute. How great and universal was the interest felt might have been seen by a glance at the long queues which at an early hour stretched along the sidewalks from the polling-places. Men were content to stand two and three hours, in line, to exercise their privileges. Chairs and stools were brought, and the happy possessors philosophically waited their turn. Dives and Lazarus met on that long level. Ten and twenty dollars were offered for places, and men whose time was priceless were obliged to wait their turn with the idler and lounger. Altogether, the spectacle, like the occasion, was one of thoughtful and infinite suggestion, and they who came to the polls to sneer at self-government left the locality with an exalted idea of the majesty of Republican institutions.

"SOMEWHAT TOO MUCH OF THIS."

AN ingenious Frenchman once remarked that "most men are mortal." To this cautious axiom writers of verses are not excepted, whatever may be the nature of their productions. Extreme sensibility to praise or blame is part of the poetic phenomena, and there are very few rhymsters who do not feel a parental pride in the airy children of their brain, or who are averse to having the relationship publicly known. A man's conceits are often the best part of him; and, as many good people are fond of imagining that they see therein some likeness to himself, it is rarely that he can resist the seductive opportunity of publishing himself before the reader in an attitude that, whether heroic or witty, is always romantic.

The above is not written solely as an expression of abstract truth. Since the establishment of this paper a number of versified articles which have appeared originally in its columns have been coolly appropriated by the Eastern press without a word of credit. It was the intention of the proprietors to make the paper purely impersonal, and that any fame or credit which it might evoke from abroad should accrue to the interests of the journal alone. For that purpose the author was willing to merge his individuality in that of The Californian. But the project failed signally. The articles were copied without credit or belief in their originality. The "Ballad of the Emeu," an ornithological and local contribution by the present editor of this paper, then a regular contributor to its columns, after appearing as original in several of the Eastern papers, was copied into an English journal without even the credit of nationality. "The Sergeant of Battery B.," by the same author, published in The Californian about three months ago, after an unaccredited reprint in the New York Leader, naturally reappeared in the Bulletin of the 10th instant as an Eastern waif. "John Burns of Gettysburgh," shorn of the same authorship, denied a "local habitation and a name," and leading a vagabond existence in the poets' corners of country papers, finally came marching home—like its lyrical representative. "The Broom Ranger," published originally in our editorial page, and leaded, reappeared in an interior exchange, without a sign of credit. But we might prolong this article indefinitely by enumerating such instances.

It has been the earnest endeavor of the editor and proprietor of this paper to make it worthy its title of The Californian, and to claim for it from our Eastern brethren a local and distinct reputation that Californians abroad should not be ashamed of. We believed the attempt feasible, and the kind notices with which the advent of the paper was received abroad justified our best endeavors; but as the distinct individuality of the paper and its contributors are necessary to its success and reputation, we trust that those who are in the habit of copying from its columns, will, by placing the credit where it belongs, assist in the intent of its publication.

AN INTERCEPTED ARTICLE.

[The following article, rudely scribbled upon several sheets of paper, was found in The Californian's box the morning after the election. From its peculiar diction and sentiment, it seems to have been a reporter's "copy" evidently intended for some cotemporary, and misplaced in our box by the author in an unguarded or intoxicated moment. Another theory is that it was intended for a paper which unhappily expired the same evening. We give it place in our columns as a contribution to the political literature of the day.]

THE sun rose from a cloudless sky on the morning of the 8th inst. To the great Democratic party, representing the intelligence and conservative power of the country it was the sun of Austerlitz, and the unterrified legions rallied round their young Napoleon, confident of that victory to earn, when they should sweep the besotted and ignorant tyrant from the throne he had with gorilla-like bestiality, and blind, befogged and belligerent brutality, defiled and prostituted to the basest purposes. In spite of the presence of the armed myrmidons of Abolition tyranny and the disgusting preparations which had been made to withhold from Constitutional Democrats the highest privilege of a freeman, the gallant Democracy and the chivalrous Broom-ranger at an early hour surrounded the polls and for some time kept the cowering and cronching Puritans at bay. Everything was propitious. As we passed through the streets with the Democratic ticket proudly pinned to our breast, we were pleased to observe that the sympathies of the talented and lady-like domestics, then engaged in the significant employment of sweeping the areas in front of Abolition dwellings, spite of the cruel proscription of their bigoted mistresses, were with us! "Hurrah for little Mac, and down wid the naygur!" "To h—ll wid Linkum!" were a few of the cheering expressions which, from time to time, met our ears, delivered with that characteristic exuberance so peculiar to their glorious nationality. And was it such beings as these that a disgraceful and tyrannizing Administration would seek to degrade, that they might advance their long-heeled, curly-headed favorites. Never! Fair Daughters of Erin, kindred in vehemence and hatred of oppression with your glorious sisters of the South, never!—we repeat, never!—while Democratic blood still courses proudly through a freeman's veins.

At the Tenth District polls we have to record one of those bare-faced violations of Constitutional law which has filled the sickening record of the Abolition Administration. The Constitution of the United States, framed by the forefathers of our country, expressly provides for one ballot-box, and one set of polling clerks. In the very face of the sacred provision of the Constitution, the wretched hirelings of corrupt rulers actually provided two boxes and two sets of clerks at this district, giving as a paltry excuse that the challenging of Democratic votes and the precedence of Democratic voters in the line, occasioned a delay which would prevent all the votes being cast by sundown. This barefaced attempt to save a few votes for their wretched tyrant, was actually carried into effect. We need say no more. From that moment we begun to despair of the success of our glorious leader.

No true Democrat could have passed down that line without feeling an inward consciousness of superiority over the clean-shaven, effeminate, and fastidiously-dressed Puritans who fawningly and hypocritically displayed their tickets on their breasts—the badge of their master, Abraham Lincoln. As we proceeded to apply to them a few of the epithets which simultaneously rose to our lips, a suborned and abolitionized minion of the law laid his hand upon us menacingly. But why repeat the outrage—has not each reader cause to know that Freedom of Speech is forever denied us under this dastardly tyranny? So we contented ourselves with contrasting the ascetic-looking and fawning sycophants of Abraham Lincoln with the brawny-handed, carelessly-attired and noble followers of George B. McClellan, whose generous natures, warmed with the social glass, showed that their very follies "leaned to virtue's side," as the divine Shakspeare has beautifully expressed it in his admirable satire on abolitionism and miscegenation in the play of Othello. Most of these valuable citizens held their tickets tightly grasped in their hands, one of their number having, as we learned, become a victim of Abolition trickery. A pious-looking Yankee, as we learn, a Sunday school teacher belonging to the church of one of our political preachers, approached and begged permission to see his ticket. The request was accorded to him with that politeness which distinguishes every true Democrat, when the wretched fanatic actually changed it to a bogus ticket, having the same general appearance but bearing the hateful names of Abraham Lincoln electors which the too-credulous Democrat received and voted. On exposing this rascality to the highest authorities, we received the audacious reply: "Every voter is supposed to be able to read!"

Could anything be more characteristic of a nation of schoolmasters? Has it come to this? Must a man, in youth, undergo the demoralizing influence of the Puritan free school system before he is entitled to the privileges of a freeman? Look at the days of Chivalry! Did the valiant Crusaders learn to make anything but their cross? Could Brian de Boise* Gilbert write? But such is the progress of that fatal fanaticism brought over in the Mayflower and lauded on the shores of Plymouth rock.

At noon a company of Lincoln's uniformed mercenaries headed by an officer, were marched to the polls, each man having received, as we are credibly informed, $10 to vote for the Black Republican despot or threatened with incarceration in the guard house if he refused. The unconstitutionality of soldiers voting never was more strongly evinced. A more spiritless and thoroughly craven set of men we never beheld. Heavens! can it be such hirelings to which the nation looks for regeneration.

2 P. M.—We are informed that the gallant soldiers, most of them regulars, voted to a man for their idol McClellan. Their manly and martial bearing, their intelligent and battle-worn faces must have struck terror to the heart of the weak-kneed Abolitionists as we saw them file past, having exercised that freeman's privilege which not even their service under Abolition rule could repress. Honor to the brave regulars! Honor to the Green Isle which saw their nativity!

4 P. M.—Fraud, corruption, tyrannical usurpation and fanaticism have done their perfect work. The country is irrevocably ruined. Our sympathizers in Rich—— in New York City will feel the terrible blow keenly. The people have allowed slav— liberty to be crushed to the earth. Our greatest and most patriotic statesman Jefferson McCle—ll—n has been hic—rejected by an overwhelming majority. The hero of Chic—hic—chic—hic—chic—hic, we mean, that is, the hero of Chic--hic—o--homin—hic—omony—has been cruelly betrayed. Abolition—despotism—unconstitutionality—miscegenation.

[At this point the manuscript becomes utterly illegible. The words conservative, gorrilla, mandlin jester and free-love are incoherently mingled, and the foreman assures us that he can decipher it no farther.—Editor.]

* The unknown author evidently has confounded the orthography of this name with one of a more local significance.

Bellini and Donizetti.—The French government, having acceded to the demand of Catania, has authorized the removal of the remains of Bellini to his native city, and a delegation from the place will soon arrive at Paris to receive the body of the illustrious composer. This brings to mind a touching anecdote in which the name of Bellini figures, and which has not before been published. The rivalry which existed between the author of Norma and the author of Lucia is well known. Bellini died in 1835 after one of his greatest triumphs, I Puritani. Donizetti followed him to the tomb in 1848. But for ten years previous, he had nearly lost his reason, and as he was playing, one day, one of the most beautiful airs of Lucia he said, "Really, that Bellini had talent!" The unfortunate man attributed to his rival the most perfect of his own master-pieces.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

MACBETH was repeated on Saturday evening at the Opera House. Mr. Kean's vitality must have been severely taxed to express the melo-dramatic "fury" of "Macbeth"—a character in which younger actors than he are apt to croak themselves hoarse as the raven which presaged Duncan's entry beneath the Thane's battlements. As a natural result, he was often obliged to hurry over the less dramatic portions of the text, and husband his powers for the usual "points" and passages requiring action. While he thus satisfied the general audience in regard to his acting, it was a sore sacrifice to the Shakspearean reader that a good deal of excellent blank verse should be lost by default. The usual characteristic and familiar soliloquies were artistically wrought. His dialogue with "Lady Macbeth," (Mrs. Kean,) after the murder of Duncan, beginning, "Did you not speak?" in look, gesture, feverish anxiety, and quick transition from extreme nervous excitement to the almost imbecile stupefaction of guilt, and the heart-broken hopelessness of the line, "This is a sorry sight!" were wonderful in naturalness and power. Mrs. Kean, as the ambitious, unscrupulous and superior spouse, afforded that excuse which the great dramatist conceived should be shown for the somewhat inconsistent and reckless butcheries of her weaker husband. Even with this apology there seems to have been a good deal of unnecessary bloodshed in the play; and it must be generally conceded that but for the lucky termination of Macbeth's existence comparatively early in his reign, he would have depleted all Scotland in his blundering anxiety to have secured the safety of his throne. The somnambulic scene was a very powerful and intense piece of acting. The play was admirably put upon the stage and the costumes chronologically perfect. Othello, on Monday night, for the benefit of Mr. Maguire, drew a very crowded house in spite of the political excitement without, on the eve of election. But as the Moor, Mr. Kean did not appear to advantage; his specialty for quiet, subtle and refined glimpses of nature, his careful emphasis and elegant elocution, which belonged rather to the role of "Iago," which he could have adorned, were not called into action—he had to thunder instead of lightning, and was obliged to rave and shout in a way not becoming to a gentleman of his years and discretion. Even as interpreted by the best actors, the role of Othello seems to require little else than a good pair of lungs, a fine animal physique, and a general disposition to incoherency and violence. Miss Chapman's "Desdemona" was a very quiet and inoffensive personation. Mrs. Kean's "Emilia" was good, and the "Iago" of Mr. Cathcart, without being very formidable, was given with "good judgment and accent."

At the Academy of Music, last evening, Messrs. Seguin and Peakes, the baritone and basso of the former Richings troupe, took a benefit in Lucrezia Borgia—Mme. Bianchi as "Lucrezia," and Signor Bianchi as "Gennaro," with Mr. Seguin as "Duke Alfonso." The attendance, which was a full one, was not as large, however, as we should have wished for the gentlemen who divide the profits. Miss Kempton made her first appearance as "Maffeo Orsini."

At the Eureka, Lew Rattler, and Tommy Peel the champion dancer, whose feet are lighter than his head, have been added to the company. Although political speeches generally have had their day, yet Birch's still rings out nightly like a clarion or trombone. Backus' imitations continue to reflect the peculiarities of the starry theatrical firmament, and Wambold sings his pleasant ballads. Manager Coes' benefit, announced for Monday night, has been postponed until Wednesday night next—he not wishing to run opposition to the Union procession on Monday evening. Holders of tickets will bear this in mind. A new piece will be produced on that occasion.

The Circus company will give a last performance for families and children to-day, at one o'clock, at Platt's Hall. The hour is fixed thus early in consequence of the Hall being engaged this evening for a ball by the German Benevolent Association. This will probably be the last opportunity that will be offered to our citizens to see so able a troupe, for a long period, as the company will sail for Australia early in the coming week. The complimentary benefit tendered to manager Wilson last evening was most worthily earned through a long course of management.

Theatrical gossip says that the Academy of Music will open next month, with an Italian Opera troupe, and Guerrabella as prima donna. The Keans are to close their season at the Opera House on the last day of the month, and proceed to Victoria, V. I. Fanny Brown is to be the next attraction at the Opera House, in piquant, sparkling musical pieces, burlesques, etc. W. J. Hill, Harry Courtaine and Miss Kate Martin have been engaged to support her. The Metropolitan will open on Monday week under the management of Mr. W. Hoffman with The Seige of Troy. Emily Jordan, Frank Lawlor, Franks and lady, and Mrs. Judah are to be ingrafted in the company. Paul Julien sails in the steamer on Monday. He goes to South America. Messrs. Peakes and Seguin, will depart for New York on the same day.

Bay View Park.—A trotting match will take place at this course to-day, at 2 o'clock, P. M., between Emigrant Maid and Black Bees. Mile heats, best three in five, in harness. See advertisement.

NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM OUR LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

New York, October 13, 1864.

THE shades of Fall are falling fast, but we do not see anybody coming this way, bearing a banner with the strange device, "Excelsior," upon it. There was a chance for this motto in the authentic Life of Abraham Lincoln, if the author, George Arnold, a late private in the national army, had bethought himself of it; but the opportunity has passed; the history is written, published, and sold by the newsdealers. It contains a fac simile of the President's handwriting, "To all whom it may concern," and, among other illustrations of his career, one at the close, of his baggage, marked "Springfield, Ills." As Wordsworth says—in reference to "Excelsior," probably—

> "It is not now as it has been of yore;
> Turn whereso'er I may,
> By night or day,
> The things which I have seen I now can see no more."

I have in vain just visited Brady's photograph gallery, and studied the faces of our various Generals and statesmen, which adorn the doorway, vestibule, and walls of the premises, with the hope of finding an answer to the demand of the time. The two Generals that face the entrance are Sherman and Hooker. Sherman has moles on his face, which may account for his pertinacious digging before Atlanta; his beard is stubbed and uncompromising, and it must have dictated the letter which has gained him as much eclat as his fighting. Hooker's expression explains Boker's poem of "Hooker's Across." If not quite that, I should say, from the contrary way his hair stands up, that he was half-seas-over, at least. Behind these photographs are those of Generals Lincoln and McClellan. Instead of eyeing each other with that lively animosity and expectant hatred which characterizes rivals, they contemplate nothing with a wooden fixedness. Upstairs, on the side of the wall formerly devoted to the photographs of Forrest in his numerous characters—which, from the great weight about the legs, appeared as if they were on exhibition upside down—are groups of our officers at the seat of war, taken in the familiar aspects of tent and field life; but I did not detect the man among them who promises to climb the Alps of Success. On the shady side of the gallery I discerned Gen. Fremont, who has been moved high up on the wall, and now hangs on a line, which, from the appearance of the figures on each side of him, must be appropriated to Dead Beats, and those who have passed out of the public eye, either as motes or beams, and cannot any longer throw dust into it. The Alps and Fremont bring to mind that impossible but heroic engraving, "Napoleon Crossing the Alps," and it suggests a mention of the capital statue of the Emperor now standing in clay in Launt Thompson's studio. It is one of the handsomest, most imperial portraits of him. All the high qualities which the imagination still endows Napoleon with, are expressed in this fine work. The enthusiasm, admiration, dread and doubt, which that inscrutable man inspired, return to the mind—passing swiftly over it like the cloud-shadows chased by the sea—when one contemplates his beautiful face, even if the impassive sculptor be sprinkling the clay head, or wrapping the legs in wet cloths, while he expatiates on the studies made in boot-tops, spurs, and the hang of the military coat. The statue is to be cast in bronze and will occupy a niche in a rich man's house, who may or who may not love art. The artist endures a misfortune which the author is exempt from; rich men only can buy the works of the former and immure them, while poor men may buy and lend the works of the latter, and diffuse them. Sylvanus Cobb, Artemus Ward and Dr. Holland go anywhere, while Church, Gifford, Thompson and Bierstadt can only abide with Dives. The time approaches possibly for the out-of-door art familiar to the Old World, but unknown here, for there is talk of statues being placed in Central Park ("Central" at present is "rote sarcastical.") Ward's "Indian and Dog" is mentioned for that purpose, and a Shakspeare. Some months ago the corner-stone was laid for the latter, and a red board erected over it, which I gaze at whenever I go the Park, with an interrogatiug admiration as deep as that which I expect to bestow on the statue itself.

Autumn, by the way, is not allowed to run riot, in the only purlieus accessible to us citizens where we might behold the panorama of the fall of the leaf. Every single leaf that ventures to drop in the course of nature is hustled away and out of sight by those indefatigable Celts who perambulate the roads and walks with barrow and broom. The grass is not permitted to die a natural death, but is kept on the green qui vive by a tormenting roller, which passes over it continually and defies its mortality. The Park managers, however, have no power over the changing colors of the season; already the vines on the bridge walls and the rocks have turned to rich browns and reds that outdo the "Victoria plaids" mounted on wheels. I ascribe the discovery of the change of seasons at the Park to myself. Professing to be a denizen of the world, I permit the habit of observation denied to those habitues of dog-carts, pony baskets, cane-sided barouches and big hammer-clothed coaches, who frequent the Park avenues. It is not the fashion for them to see anything but space on the rosettes on their horses' heads; their eyes are fixed on these by the same principle which makes the man who takes your carte-de-visite say, "Place your eyes on this mark, and look as pleasant as you can." I have sometimes seen an expression resembling animation in the faces of rigid young women, hoisted high in the air, with a tiger behind them and a puppy before them, when a gentleman in sulphur-colored trowsers, on a McClellan saddle, cantered alongside to exchange a few cabalistic words, the open sesame of clique. The cross, plain, middle-aged old ladies that infest the drives, nearly obliterated by their drivers, and smothered by the carriage hood, are never mitigated by the gentleman in the McClellan saddle, the deer, or the swans; their wheels wind in and out, and they go home through the Fifth Avenue, true to their code of not remarking either Beauty or the Beast, Art or Nature. Even that bad man, who is always there in the crushed hat and gray sacque, with a nondescript vehicle and a tremendous horse, dares not, you may bet, take one sniff of the atmosphere—the Park's speciality—to reveal which Olmstead and Vany racked their taste and invention.

Mr. Olmstead has left it to occupy some place in the eternal Mariposa mine business, where something is being expected to turn up by all the Micawbers. Mr. Vany has returned more strictly to his architectural duties. Peace to the ashes of their Commission. They did their duty on the spot which is now the resort of shoddy and the delight of snobby.

It is to be hoped that California will not affect Mr. Olmstead as it has Ross Browne, and set him off on perpetual tours. Ross Browne and his seven children tour everywhere. Now they are at Frankfort-on-the-Main, now they are on the top of a ranch, and now they have just started, in Harper's Magazine, for Arizona. Who is interested in Arizona? Who loves Washoe? Who longs for Idaho? Can these places rival Chase and the Greenback? When travellers travel to manufacture books, their travels do not read well, and I am afraid Ross Browne will ruin himself with these copious tours and illustrations. It has been the destiny, however, of the American to make authorship a trade. The great times have gone by when authors were respected in rags, with the technical "crush" in their hands: they must wear "biled shirts," now, and have anchovy toast. Here all aspire to literature as well as to the President's chair. I know a young man who is distinguished for his bulletins—those brown-paper affairs which are posted before newspaper office doors; in this class of composition he excels so greatly that he is attached to the corps of a promiuent paper, and is called a literary man!

Speaking of travellers reminds me of our last Englishman, Mr. Galdwin Smith, the Professor of Modern History, at Oxford. He is here to witness the Presidential contest, and to write upon it, as well as to write upon our political system at large. He sympathizes with the North, and has already written much in our favor. Mr. George Augustus Sala, the traveller preceding Professor Smith, has been recalled by his paper, the London Telegraph. If he returns to London with "blushing honors" it will be because his nose has grown redder, and for no other reason. It was my good fortune to pass the first evening he arrived in America with Mr. Sala. He informed me that he had eaten oysters several times that day, and was much impressed with the power of rye whisky. Mr. Sala is a highly-colored man, and resembles a meerschaum that does not color to the satisfaction of its owner. He wears English clothes, and a large scarf pin—the portrait of half a horse, in gold. He anticipated a visit to California; should he come you will find him the most impudent, acrimonious letter writer we ever had; also the clearest in a certain sense. He sees things as pictures, and describes them well, but not as profound facts which involve the philosophy of human nature.

To continue the subject of assurance, Mrs. Matilda Heron Stoepel has been "tackling" the Home Journal with one of her modest letters, in which she states she is "offered ten thousand dollars in gold for one hundred nights in California all in Camille. Having endured that great artiste, praised in Golden Era by the author of the Hasheesh Eater, Ada Isaacs Menken, in Mazeppa, I presume a hundred representations of a play by that rotten-minded writer, the younger Dumas, can also be endured. Miss Heron repeats in her letter, the observation she made when Willis told her that Irving wept like a child over her Camille. "I would be content to die myself to have his tears shed over me!" Should such an observation die? Never! therefore, I contribute my mite towards handing the hat of sympathy, sentiment, and bathos round.

Meteoric Showers.—The following telegram has been received in this city:

Virginia, November 10.—Astronomers anticipate a recurrence this year of the November meteoric shower of 1833. The mornings from the 11th to the 15th are all likely to show an unusual number of meteors, especially from the 12th to the 14th. The best time of observation is from half-past one o'clock, A. M., onward. The radiant point is the constellation Leo. Observers in California, Nevada and the Pacific Coast generally are requested to report their observations to Professor Silliman, Jr., San Francisco, for the American Journal of Science, where they will be published for the good of science.

Torchlight Procession.—A grand torchlight procession to celebrate the recent Union election victories, will take place on Monday night next. Particulars in our advertising columns.

THE GLOVE—A TALE.

BEFORE his lion-court,
To see the griesly sport,
Sate the King;
Beside him group'd his princely peers,
And dames aloft, in circling tiers,
Wreathed round their blooming ring.

King Francis, where he sate,
Raised a finger—yawned the gate,
And, slow from his repose,
A LION goes!
Dumbly he gazed around
The foe-encircled ground;
And, with a lazy gape,
He stretched his lordly shape,
And shook his careless mane,
And—laid him down again!

A finger raised the King—
And nimbly have the guard
A second gate unbarr'd:
Forth, with a rushing spring,
A TIGER sprung!
Wildly the wild one yell'd
When the lion he beheld:
And, bristling at the look,
With his tail his sides he strook,
And roll'd his rabid tongue.
In many a wary ring
He swept round the forest-king,
With a fell and rattling sound,
And laid him on the ground,
Grommelling!
The King raised his finger; then
Leap'd two LEOPARDS from the den
With a bound:
And boldly bounded they
Where the crouching tiger lay
Terrible!
And he griped the beasts in his deadly hold!
In the grim embrace they grappled and rolled.
Rose the lion with a roar!
And stood the strife before;
And the wild-cats on the spot,
From the blood thirst, wroth and hot,
Halted still!

From the gallery rais'd above,
A fair hand dropp'd a glove:
Midway between the beasts of prey,
Lion and tiger; there it lay,
The winsome lady's glove!

Fair Cunigonde said, with a lip of scorn,
To the knight Delorges: "If the love you have sworn
Were as gallant and leal as you boast it to be,
I might ask you to bring back that glove to me!"

The Knight left the place where the lady sate;
The Knight he has passed through the fearful gate;
The lion and tiger he stoop'd above,
And his fingers have closed on the lady's glove!

All shuddering and stunn'd, they beheld him there—
The noble knights and the ladies fair;
But loud was the joy and the praise the while
He bore back the glove with his tranquil smile!
With a tender look in her softening eyes,
That promised reward to his warmest sighs,
Fair Cunigonde rose her knight to grace—
He tossed the glove in the lady's face!
"Nay, spare me the guerdon, at least," quoth he!

A MUCH-ABUSED BRIDEGROOM.—A stalwart young rustic, who was known as a formidable operator in a "free fight," had just married a blooming and beautiful country girl only sixteen years of age, and the twain were at a party where a number of young folks of both sexes were enjoying themselves in the good old-fashioned pawn-playing style. Every girl in the room had been called out and kissed except Mrs. B., the beautiful young bride aforesaid; and although there was not a youngster present who was not dying to taste her lips, they were restrained by the presence of her herculean husband, who stood regarding the party with a look of sullen dissatisfaction. They mistook the cause of his anger, however; for, suddenly rolling up his sleeves, he stepped into the middle of the room, and, in a tone of voice that at once secured marked attention, said:

"Gentlemen, I have been noticing how things have been working here for some length of time, and I ain't half satisfied. I don't want to raise a fuss; but—"

"What's the matter, John?" inquired half a dozen voices. "What do you mean? Have we done anything to hurt your feelings?"

"Yes, you have, all; all of you have hurt my feelings, and I've got just this to say about it; here's every gal in the room been kissed mighty nigh a dozen times apiece, and there's my wife, who I consider as likely as any of 'em, has not had a single one to-night; and I just tell you now, if she don't get as many kisses the balance of the time as any gal in the room, the man that slights her has got me to fight—that's all. Now go ahead with your plays!"

If Mrs. B. was slighted during the balance of the evening, we did not know it. As for ourselves, we know that John had no fault to find with us individually for any neglect on our part.

PERSONALLY RESPONSIBLE.—The following story, though latterly related of "a distinguished Southern gentleman, and former member of the cabinet," was formerly told, we are almost quite certain, of the odd and eccentric John Randolph of Roanoke, with certain omissions and additions. Be that as it may, the anecdote is a good one, and "will do to keep."

The gentleman was a boarder in one of the most splendid of the New York hotels, and, preferring not to eat at the table d'hote, had his meals served in his own parlor, with all the elegance for which the establishment had deservedly become noted.

Being somewhat annoyed with the airs of the servant who waited upon him—a negro of "the blackest dye"—he desired him at dinner one day to retire. The negro bowed, and took his stand behind the gentleman's chair. Supposing him to be gone, it was with some impatience that, a few minutes after, the gentleman saw him step forward to remove his soup.

"Fellow," said he, "leave the room! I wish to be alone."

"Excuse me, sah," said Cuffee, drawing himself "stiffly up," "but I'se 'sponsible for de silver."

LOST IN THE SNOW.

IN the year 18—, I received an invitation from a friend in Hereford, who had often pressed me to visit him before. I left London early one morning by the Great Western Railway, and arrived in Hereford the same night. We had capital shooting in the neighborhood for several days, and our evenings were spent convivially enough. One night, a gentleman from the neighborhood of Rhayader joined us, and hearing from my host that I was fond of sport, pressed me to visit him, and he would give me some excellent shooting. The invitation was given so cordially that I accepted it at once, and as it included our host, it was arranged that so soon as our present party broke up, which would be in a day or two, we should take the early morning coach and journey to Rhayader. The last night of our stay in Hereford was bitterly cold, and there were indications of a heavy fall of snow, but we thought nothing of it, and retired to bed early, as the coach started at six o'clock, and we had a long day before us. When I looked out of the window in the morning, I could just see by the dimly-lighted streets that there had been a great fall, and it was still snowing. We enjoyed a good breakfast, and then sallied out for the hotel whence the coach started. When we arrived it had just come in and was changing horses. We were the only passengers, and although I dislike the inside of a coach, still, in deference to the wishes of my friend, and perhaps a little in deference to the weather, I consented, and we got in. For the first twenty miles we went along pretty well, but after we had left Kington, and the road commenced winding among the hills, it was awful work for the horses, and when Radnor was reached we were three hours behind time: but our conveyance bore the magic letters V. R. upon it, and was obliged to go on, and we determined to go with it, as Rhayader lay only seventeen miles farther. But this stage, notwithstanding all my friend could say to the contrary, I would ride outside, and accordingly joined the coachman on the box. We had heavy work for the first few miles, but after this was over the road appeared to be almost clear of snow, and we seemed to be making fine progress. I congratulated the driver on it, when he darkly remarked, we might suffer for it by and by, for we were now in Radnor forest, and added something of which I could only catch the words: "Snow drifting—hollows farther on." Presently the coach came to a dead stop, and the coachman hallooing "Joe," the guard came forward. They held a low conversation, from which I understood they considered there was great danger of the road ahead, but still thought it would be as unsafe to go back as forwards. All this time I was far from realizing the danger of the position, or I might have prevented part of what happened after. We were now approaching what appeared to me to be a perfect level, and the coachman touching his wheeler with the whip, the animal slipped, then plunged, and the leaders becoming frightened, increased their pace down what afterwards proved to be a steep dip in the road, and in less time than it takes to tell it, we were all fighting in a perfect sea of drifted snow which was here quite fifteen feet deep. Self-preservation being the first law of nature, I managed, I know not how, to struggle on to the roof, where I was joined by the guard, the snow being then up to our waists, and still snowing heavily. The driver had been dragged off his box and was among the confused mass of horses. We could just dimly see where every plunge was hastening their death-agony. Each second the plunges grew more and more feeble, and in a few minutes, the guard and I looked in each other's faces with the sad conviction that we two were the only living beings in that howling wilderness, and with an instantaneous death staring us in the face. The guard began muttering something about poor Jim, the horses, and of all things the bags entrusted to his care, while I bitterly thought of my kind, noble-hearted friend, smothered in a moment when not thinking of danger.

"Come, Joe, my boy," I said, "we must not give way. It won't do to be smothered here, which we very soon shall be if we don't do something. Does not a bank rise up on one side higher than the road—quick?"

"Yes, on the left-hand side the road rises; on there the the country slopes upwards all the way round to Radnor, and a foot man might, if he picked his way to the left, reach the town; but who would jump? It may leave off snowing; and besides I can't leave the bags."

"Well, my boy," I exclaimed, "it is only a chance to die at once or in a few minutes, so here goes." And setting to work, I cleared the snow away as far as I could, and after a dreadful wrestle, managed to make a platform, from which I jumped. I landed nearly up to my chin, but in time I worked my way up the bank till I was comparatively free, whence I urged my companion, by everything I could say, to follow, but all that I got from him was—"Radnor, left—poor Jim—can't leave the bags;" and so I struggled off to the left, the last words of poor Joe ringing in my ears—Can't leave the bags."

How I reached Radnor I know not, but when I recovered from a dangerous illness, consequent on all I had endured, I heard I had arrived at the inn in the night, in a wild state, repeating, "I can't leave the bags." They went next day to dig out the coach, but it was three days before they reached it; then they found the coachman dead between the horses, my friend sitting calmly inside, and Joe still sticking to his bags. I never reached Rhayader. DEANE SMITH.

A SNEEZING HEAD.—The manager of the Berlin theatre got up a drama in which a human head was to be offered to a tyrant. In order to produce as much effect as possible, he resolved to use a human head. On the stage was placed a table covered with a cloth; on the table was a basin, and an actor, concealed under the cloth, poked up his head through a hole in the table, so as to seem to be placed in the basin. The effect was prodigious; the audience applauded and trembled. Unluckily a wag, who had been strolling about the stage, had sprinkled a spoonful of sneezing powder on the basin, and just as the tyrant had finished his address to the severed head of his enemy, the head replied by a hearty fit of sneezing, chaunging the audience "from grave to gay" with remarkable expedition.

THE CITY OF GOLD.—The Royal Exchange, with its wide expanse of pavement alike in front and in rear, forms an islet amidst the rushing thoroughfares around; and on these paved open spaces groups may be seen standing engaged in absorbing conversation. The streets are thronged with hurrying vehicles; the foot-pavement with bustling but steady-going passengers; the alleys, like Birchin-lane and Finch-lane, which connect the leading thoroughfares, are equally thronged; and hurrying steps are ever racing through those covered passages, lined with offices on either side, which form a peculiar feature in this part of London, and before whose entrances the stranger naturally halts, fearing to trespass on what seems, and indeed is, private ground. Young men and old men alike are seen hurrying to and fro, and all appear absorbed in their work. You may easily tell the office clerks, racing on their errands to learn the latest price of some particular stock, from the less mobile but more absorbed seniors of this busy world. Engrossed as all are, you nevertheless see (in ordinary times at least) that theirs is not a sad work. The sight, in truth, is rather disappointing to a stranger who has heard of the cares of wealth and the deceitfulness of riches. As he looks upon the men who go past him, the sight does not release the conception of "City" life which he has formed from books or from his own imaginings. He looks in vain for the haggard look and care-worn features which he has learnt (very incorrectly) to associate with city men, and especially with the dealers in money. Overburdened, no doubt, some of these men are occasionally—and in what trade or profession is it otherwise?—but, on the whole, they wear a more lively and cheerful look than any other set of business-men we have seen. They are intent on their work; they have no time to stand and parley with you; but they go about their business with liveliness and zest. You never hear the slow monotones of depression; their voices are quick and lively, and a laugh and a bit of bandinage are seldom quite absent as they fly about in search of information or in execution of commissions. They dress well, in the substantial style—and a gold chain across the waistcoat, or a flower in the button-hole, are their favorite and not very conspicuous modes of personal decoration. Sometimes, indeed, you will see the gay-colored neck-scarf, buttoned surtout, white waistcoat and light gloves, familiar to you in Pall-Mall and Piccadilly; for even the West-end swell now-a-days ventures into the vortex of financial speculation; but he looks a butterfly among the busy throng, and his air (as doubtless he wished it to be) is quite different from that of the habitues of the precinct. Nothing more conduces to preserve youthfulness than a considerable amount of mental activity. The alertness and vivacity of the mind transfer themselves to the personal appearance. And, despite all the worry and anxieties which these money-dealers and speculators are supposed to, and sometimes do, undergo, they wear better, and keep their youth longer than the farmer and provincial classes generally. There is no sauntering here; and men of three-score and upwards step out as lightly as men of half their age in provincial places. In truth, it is the elderly gentlemen who show to most advantage in this monetary metropolis; and ever and anon you meet with the fresh, clear complexion, pure white whiskers, and brisk look and movement, which characterize the best specimens of our elderly English gentlemen. It seems a healthy as well as exciting pursuit which men ply in the precinct of Mammon. Even the speculators par excellence—men who are rich to-day and poor to-morrow—as a class, live for the bright side of the picture, and look as if they did so.—Blackwood's Magazine.

JOHN BULL UNDER CRITICISM.—I know well how we regard the wretched foreigner, sneering at his frivolity, his capricious ways, his poor, weak, purposeless existence, and the rest of it. I know all our national contempt for the man of eau sucré and reassert that for unreality, for a pretension to seem something that he is not—for, in fact, an outrageous affectation—John Bull has not his equal in Europe. The reason is simple enough. Every man in England knows and feels that his acceptance in society depends on the class in which he is supposed to move, and as class distinctions with us are meted out by money, it behoves every one to appear better off than he is. To do this requires no small share of skill or address, because it has to be done in the midst of thousands all trying the same game. To live in a fashionable quarter, or sufficiently near one to steal the name of a neighboring square, to indicate your whereabouts, is a first necessity; to live with a certain outward semblance of fortune is the second; to give dinners and entertainments comes next; to figure in subscription lists, stand forward in works of benevolence, all follow. Now, as it is essential that you should do all these things on the scale of a man of ten times your means, you only can accomplish the feat by employing substitutes; that is to say, all around and about you must be a mockery—your house a four-storied delusion, your butler a ruined green-grocer, your Bordeaux a full-flavored Chancellor of the Exchequer, and your clothes the cheap product of the last Manchester discovery in devil's dust and glue. Will you tell me that the man who lives in this charmed circle of everlasting lies, in a mock house, with a mock household, a mock dinner, and an enamelled wife with a mock diamond necklace, can come out real and true? Will you ask me to believe that he who breathes an atmosphere of falsehood all his days, can preserve throughout it his own pure unsullied nature?—Blackwood's Magazine.

A CURE FOR JEALOUSY.—A jealous man, who was on a visit to London, was induced to call on a clairvoyant to ascertain what his wife was doing at her residence, some ninety miles away. "She is sitting in her parlor," said the lady, "and she looks out of the window, as if in expectation." "Strange," said the gentleman, "who can she expect?" "Some one is entering the door! she seizes him and caresses him fondly." "Horrible!" interrupted the gentleman, thinking of the Divorce Court. "Now he lays his head in her lap, and looks tenderly into her eyes." "Dreadful! she shall suffer for this." "Now he wags his tail!" and as this explained the story, old jealousy decamped, and resolved not to be inquisitive again in regard to his wife.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well:
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Bello, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

HOW does it come that so little interest is taken in matters of pure science by men otherwise of general information, and who have constantly and closely devoted themselves to business and other subjects requiring the most abstract thought and systematic effort? It cannot be because of the ease with which such information comes to the mind, and to spare themselves labor. This would be an unworthy admission and is always denied to be the true reasou. It is moreover at once seen to be no reason, for of all pursuits and avocations the liberal professions and the mercantile career are certainly the most laborious and exhausting, and yet are cheerfully adopted by their followers with the stern fact plainly before their eyes, that the demands upon their mental as well as physical system will be inexorable and heavy to the last degree. Else how can it be accounted for, that these professions in every country and at all times have furnished so many remarkable instances of insanity, intense dissipation, utter prostration and early death as compared with the statistics of the manual laborer's life on the same points. No! by the laborer himself, whatever may be the pride of his class and its recognized importance, it is no longer denied under the influence of an expanding intelligence that his labors are, if not light, at least much less exhaustive, and the system much more quickly and surely restored than in the case of intense and continued mental exercise. Moreover, it seems a curious fact that the body of men who, by their studies and learning—the metaphysician and anatomist analyzing both mind and body, know their strong and weak points, and that the weak preponderate, and hence must know the danger of undue strain upou the system—are of all men the least cautious and the most abusive of their own powers.

What a striking example of this was given to the world in the death of Hugh Miller! When roaming on foot over the hills aud glens of his own Scotland with pick and hammer in hand, in search of geological facts for or against some old theory, or with which to erect some new scientific structure; when gathering from the earth by hard labor the elements of his great reputation as a geologist in subsequent years; and storing his mind with the data for his splendid descriptions aud powerful analogies in which he so loved to revel, who could then have thought that the robust Scotchman, with his stalwart form and well-knit frame, would yield to disease of the mind, to some mysterious derangement of the brain beyond medical reach, and induced directly by intense overwork and stress upon that most delicate and sensitive of man's bodily organs? Yet so it was; and well do we recollect, though some years ago, the startling announcement that Hugh Miller of Cromarty had fallen by his own hand iu violent death iu a momeut of temporary insanity. Not wonderful, however, on second thought, for it was predicted, ten years before the event, by his near friends who closely watched his career and its struggles, and affectionately warned him of the danger. Earnestly engaged then upon his defence of the Free Church of Scotland, in the columus of the Witness, in which he dealt staggering blows upon his foes, and with equal strength supported aud raised to its high position his beloved but then prostrate Kirk, chief among that small but brilliant circle of men who have given marked rauk to Scotlaud's moral history, his task was heavy enough, his measure of labor full to repletion. But not euough for this man of untiring action and teeming brain: he loved the service of his church, took the leading part in its heaviest struggles, and hore the brunt of the polemical fight; but he loved equally well, if not more deeply and with the love of a first passion, his darling science of geology, and on the night of the conclusion of his last and greatest work, The Testimony of the Rocks, with these words upon his lips, "My brain burns as the recollection grows," fell a victim to the conjurations and phantoms of a brain broken by the strain of thought.

Who ever hears of the insanity of manual labor or of continued dissipation consequent upon physical exhaustion? It requires the excitement of a passion, the intensity of strong feeling, ardent devotion and exacting thought to produce these effects which are unknown to the sane sobriety aud wholesome mediocrity of mind iu the mere lahorer—who plies his tools and rests content in a material world of mechanism that may tire the muscles but never disturbs the reason. It is a curious thought that from the mind and its operations, of spirit and ethereal, should come danger and distress to the body. This fact has often been made available by potentates and lesser men, for their own purposes, to justify their deeds of oppression upon the objects of their enmity, who in all ages have been chiefly of the scientific class. How often and easily has the cry of "madman!" been raised and fastened upon some bright son of song, some poet whose only crime was an obedience to the law of his nature that he could not love and be wise at the same time. Innumerable are the cases of its application to men of science by kingly aud popular malice and jealousy. Galileo, because he saw, to his own unutterable astonishment, what no mortal eye before that moment had seen, the high mountains and ridges, furrows and valleys of the moon's surface, rings and satellites and nebulæ and the whole heavens sown with stars too small to be discerned by the naked eye, was by Roman Catholic power denounced as a madman, and given over to cruel persecution in the walls of a prison, there to spend some of his latest hours. Nor has France, with its liherality and love of science, been an exception; for take De Caus and his treatment, for the example, and we see a distinguished mathematician, to whom no longer can be denied a share in the invention of the steam engine, imprisoued for many years at the Bicetre, by order of Cardinal Richelieu, who very aptly expressed the feeling by the remark that he had a madman in whom some professed to have discovered a man of genius. To him the terms were synonymous, and the definition has been popular ever since. Iu this age and country instances are not wanting—true, not to the extent of the prison cell, but quite as positive a belief in the truth of the maxim, for such it now is. Let us go to the south bank of the Ohio and we will see a solitary grave with a plain pine board at its head bearing the name of John Fitch, undoubtedly the first who applied steam to navigation in America, and who, in spite of the rebukes he received even from such men as Franklin, predicted that the shrill scream of the steamboat would be daily heard by his spirit as it hovered about his last resting place. Driven from society into what was then a wilderness, denounced as a visionary fool and a lunatic, his last years were passed in wild frontier life, aud in gloomy silence he sought relief in the fatal cup that drowns sorrow but in death.

Is this, then, the result of such pursuits. and do you wonder that men shun their pernicious influence? Not pernicious are they in themselves, but only made so by a perverted understanding, small foresight or interested motive. Are not your illustrations to the contrary? No! these only go to show the danger of self-abuse, of mental mistreatment—no more—and indeed the study of the most abstruse science and profound philosophy are often safely cultivated by men of the busiest life and of purely practical pursuits. What branch of science presents more difficulties and requires closer analysis than music, when studied not as an amusement merely, but as a science, in its structure and principles of sound and time, quite as much so as many of the so-called exact sciences; and this we have on the authority of one of the most eminent natural philosophers and engineers of the country. Yet many devotedly cultivate this science, ennobling and exalting the mind, without danger or apprehension of danger to the mind, while studiously avoiding all the physical scieuces under some vague fear of their difficulties and perils, ignorant of the fact that the most profound problem of astronomy, when rightly pursued, is not less harmful or less simple.

TRISMEGISTUS.

SANITARY FUND.—The loyal people of the State show no more truly their devotiou to the nation's interests, than by their contributions to that noblest of charities, the U. S. Sanitary Commission. During the past week, when all patriots have been working for the ballot-box, in whose depths are held the natiou's life, they have not forgotten the Sanitary box beside it, wherein is held the life and strength of our bleeding soldiers. The Executive Committee have been so favored iu their receipts, that by Monday's steamer they will be able to make another handsome remittance to the parent Treasury in New York. Since our last issue they have received from Soldiers' Aid Societies, recently organized by the active agents of the Commission throughout the State, twenty five receipts amounting to $962 25 in coin, and $90 in Legal Tender Notes; from the polls in the Interior, $1,773 47 in coin, and $410 in Legal Tender Notes; from San Francisco polls, $4,965 81 in coin, and $86 10 in Legal Tender Notes; from the Camanche, $307 80; from the Police Department, $671 50; from sundry city contributors, $368 30. Total, 9,049 13 in coin, aud $586 10 in Legal Tender Notes.

The monitor Camanche, that has even during its construction served its country so well by its daily contributions to the sick and wounded soldiers, is finished at last, and on Monday next at 12 M., it will be consigned to the element on which it will battle strongly for the natiou. To-morrow, Rev. B. J. Low will deliver a discourse from the decks to the many visitors who will visit the yard and will informally christen her for her work. Seats have been arranged throughout the enclosure for the visitors to the launch, the proceeds being for the benefit of the Sanitary Fund. The steamer San Rafael, by the generosity of its owuer, has been placed at the disposal of the Executive Committee and will take a deck-load of passengers on Monday to an eligible position where the launch can be easily seen. Every one on that day can be accommodated with a view of the launch, and can do somethiug at the same time for our heroic army.

A SAFE THAT WAS NOT SAFE.—A late English paper says: "One of what are termed fire-proof safes has at length been dug out of the ruins of Colonel McMurdo's residence, and upon being opened was found not to have secured a single valuable, either of plate or jewelry. A presentation sword from Lord Elleuborough, with a real Damascus blade, was found melted in two. This sword was made in the time of the Crusades, and was highly prized by the gallant Colonel. Another sword presented by General Sir Charles Napier has also been found injured in a similar manner, and the whole of the gold appointments and diamonds have been lost. So much value did the gallant Colonel attach to the various presentations that he had holes drilled in the bottom of the safe, so as to screw them down to the floor, and the flames entering the apertures destroyed the contents. Had it not been for the drillings of the holes everything might have been secured."

NOVEMBER 8TH, 1864.

MILLIONS of stars in sight,
And leagues of red and white
Floating from every height
From Russian Hill to Rincon;
Steeds gallop through the street,
Fire flying from their feet,
Men of all nations meet,
Talking of Lincoln.

When the bright sun, as red
As blood our soldiers shed,
One-half his course had sped,
Serenely, slowly;
There came a shadowy man,
As from death's caravan
Had come a spectre wan,
With message holy.

His beard was white as snow,
His tottering steps were slow,
And like the mistletoe
With emerald blossom
Decking the dying tree,
So fondly now clasped he
A fair boy full of glee
To his drear bosom.

"My boy!" the old man cried,
"My father, when he died,
Called his children to his side—
Each one addressing;
And last, he said to me:
'I leave no legacy
But one dear memory
And my fond blessing.

"'Good by! and try to be
Worthy of God and me;
Keep your heart from malice free,
Your lips from slander;
Remember, my only son,
In many a battle won
I stood by WASHINGTON,
The good commander.

"'When winter nights are cold,
And children's children fold
Your neck—then wrinkled, old—
Begging a story;
Tell them my prondest right
For Liberty to fight,
To keep the good flag bright
My greatest glory.'

"My boy, even now I see
My father beckoning me;
This day's a legacy
For you to think on
When I am in my grave—
You saw the old flag wave
While I my last vote gave For Abraham Lincoln."

The weak voice ended—then
Opened that throng of men,
Opened and shut again
That human thicket:
And all around grew still
As in that fateful till,
(Fateful for good or ill,)
He dropped the ticket.

Then from the eager throng
Three cheers rose loud and strong
Echoed the slopes along
From Russian Hill to Rincon;
The boy cried merrily,
"Hurrah for Liberty!
My grandpapa and me
Both vote for Lincoln."

EMILIE LAWSON.

LOOK TO THE BEDROOM!—If two persons are to occupy a bedroom during a night, let them step upon weighing scales as they retire, and then again in the morning, and they will find their actual weight to be at least a pound less in the morning. Frequently there will be a loss of two or more pounds, and the average loss throughout the year will he more than one pound. That is, during the night there is a loss of a pound of matter which has gone off from their bodies, partly from the lungs and partly from the pores of the skin. The escaped material is carbonic acid and decayed animal matter, or poisonous exhalations. This is diffused through the air in part, and in part absorbed by the bed-clothes. If a single ounce of wool or cotton be burned in a room, it will so completely saturate the air with smoke, that one can hardly breathe, though there can only be an ounce of foreign matter in the air. If an ounce of cotton be burned every half hour during the night, the air will be kept continually saturated with smoke, unless there can be an open door or window for it to escape. Now, the sixteen ounces of smoke thus formed are far less poisonous than the sixteen ounces of exhalatious from the lungs and bodies of the two persons who have lost a pound in weight during the eight hours of sleeping, for while the dry smoke is mainly taken into the lungs, the damp odors from the body are absorbed both into the lungs and into the pores of the whole body.

Need more be said to show the importance of having bedrooms well ventilated and of thoroughly airing the sheets, coverlets and mattresses in the morning, before packing them up iu the form of a neatly-made bed?—Journal of Health.

PREMIUM FURNITURE.—The late Mechanics' Fair of this city gave the premium to Goodwin & Co., importers and manufacturers of furniture, No. 528 Washington street, for articles on exhibition in their line. How happily the name and the award harmonize! It was certainly a Good-win for them.

We have frequently heard of the power of the imagination, but the following instance, which lately occurred in France, affords a novel illustration: A respectably-dressed man of about fifty called on a man at St. Etienne, and said, "I am a builder by trade, and in making my contracts am sometimes obliged to drink rather too freely. Finding myself lately indisposed in consequence of these excesses, I was advised to apply to M. X——, of Caux, who had, I was told, a secret of sovereign efficacy in such cases. I followed the recommendation and took the remedy, which consisted of a white powder done up in small packets; but instead of being cured I find I am poisoned, and I have been told this morning that the remedy is arsenic. Yes, sir," continued the speaker, with great violence, "I am poisoned, and already to-day I had one violent attack." While speaking his countenance changed, his breathing became heavy, and throwing himself back in a chair he exclaimed, "I am going to have another—I am dying—help! help!" The doctor went toward him and found that he was dead. A post-mortem examination proved that the man died from paralysis of the pectoral muscles, brought on by violent emotion produced by a diseased imagination. No trace of poison existed. The white powder was analyzed, and turned out not to be arsenic, but simply sugar of milk, a completely harmless substance.

A Kingly Baby.—An English paper gives the following description of a public exhibition of the Prince of Wales' baby, in which the King of Denmark assisted: "The King came forward and took the baby from the arms of the two ladies who held it between them. The crowd became enthusiastic. He dandled the baby up and down. The feelings of the crowd were becoming almost too intense. It was only possible to improve the situation in one way, but even this improvement was brought about—the Prince of Wales was induced to come forward to the little window where all these performances took place, and he in his turn took the baby in his arms, with the natural awkwardness of an Englishman called upon to be theatrical in his behavior, and exhibited himself in the character of a father to the people below. With unruffled equanimity the baby permitted himself to be dandled up and down and the crowd shrieked in ecstasy. At this early stage of his career the baby has shown a due appreciation of his position. Another baby might have cried, but he no doubt reflected that he was a baby to whom much was given; from whom much was consequently expected; and he conducted himself with a grave propriety of demeanor worthy of the occasion."

Perfume and Poetry.—Moore and Haynes Bailey have celebrated the "NIGHT BLOOMING CEREUS" in charming verses which have been set to exquisite music, but Phalon & Son have immortalized its fragrance in the new Extract for the handkerchief. To the Public.—Go to the South Beach Bathing House, foot of Third street, near the Camanche, for comfort, pleasure or health; where can be found at all hours warm, cold, or shower Salt Water Baths. The water is taken through pipes extending over five hundred feet in the bay, and as pure as can be drawn from the ocean. The public have only to give this place a trial to satisfy themselves that this is the best fitted up Bathing House in this city—the North Beach House having blown up.

N. B.—The boiler and machinery are entirely separate from the Bathing House.

Value of Health.—Upwards of thirty years since, Dr. Benjamin Brandreth introduced to the community a vegetable pill which has since become the household medicine of tens of thousands of families in the United States, and throughout the countries of Europe and South America. When first brought to the notice of the public, few could be persuaded of its virtues. Gradually, at first, it was tried, and then, as case after case of recovery from many diseases reached the ears of the public, its value increased in what might be called geometrical proportions. Medical men, who had seen patients recover rapidly by the use of Brandreth's pills who had for indefinite periods of time been under their charge without showing signs of improvement, began to despair, believing that the great secret of life and health had been discovered, and their occupation was gone from them. Some, more enterprising than their fellows, at once adopted into their practice the great conservator of health, and their success corresponded with their liberality. Since then, the Brandrethian system has been in the ascendant.

It is said that no habit has spread throughout the world so rapidly as the use of tobacco. This is a mistake. It has taken two hundred years to make the nicotine plant known to the nations, while in less than a quarter of a century the Brandreth Pill, as a purifier of the stomach and bowels, and as a preventive of every fever known, no matter by what term called or from what cause originated, has become the indispensable necessity of every people on the globe, civilized and barbarous.

It may be asked, why is this preparation so eminent over others? We answer, because, above every other, it does its work directly.

It cleanses the system thoroughly of every impurity, and restores the blood to its pristine condition. Dr. Brandreth holds, and his conclusions are based on physiological as well as Biblical fact, that all diseases originate in the blood, and that a medicine which seizes upon and purifies it, places the body that contains it beyond the possibility of abnormal action. It is not necessary to attempt to vindicate a theory so self-evident. We know that a fountain cannot send forth at the same time sweet water and bitter; and we also know that we cannot look for health where the fountain of health is corrupted. Purify the blood system, and life, strength, youth, and absence from disease are assured. These, the Brandreth Pill not only promises, but gives. Let those who would go through existence without sickness or even momentary pain, remember that the preventive from every ill lies in the vegetable preparation whose active and passive virtues no sane man will dispute, known as the Brandreth Medicine.

It is hardly necessary to state that Dr. B. continues his unremitting care in the manufacturing department of the Brandreth Pills; or that they are entirely free from chemical or mineral preparations; these facts being well known and understood to be so. While mercury and bleeding, and other deleterious remedies are becoming more and more unpopular, the Brandreth Pills are extending the sphere of their usefulness by the appreciation of a generous and discerning public.

The Electropathic Institute, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electropathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathise with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required!

Farrand's Oscillating

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quick silver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF

Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF
Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. se24

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

REOPENED FOR THE SEASON.

THE CRYSTAL SPRINGS HOTEL,

Situated four miles from the San Mateo Railroad depot, in a most splendid valley, surrounded with large, beautiful, natural trees, is now open for the public. The road from San Mateo to the house has been recently macadamized, making it the finest drive in California. The House and Cottages have been refitted and thoroughly renovated. New spring beds and every modern improvement have been added to the sleeping department. The larder, as usual, contains all the delicacies of the season. Stages leave San Mateo depot on the arrival of the trains for Crystal Springs.

A fine stable is now opened at San Mateo by Messrs. Byrnes & Ames, who will furnish horses and carriages, or saddle horses, at low rates, to the public. Parties wishing rooms or meals, on arrival, can engage them by telegraph, via San Mateo.

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

Of Southern splendor 'neath a Southern sky!
The soft star-closes to the golden days
I dreamed away, in that far, tropic clime,
Wherein Love's blossom budded, bloomed and died!
How many arrows from Time's quiver fell
Around us, love, unheeded! while we roamed
Through fruited avenues of odorous limes,
Of citron and banana—where the air
Seemed swooning with its weight of rifled sweets.
Or down the spectral glen, where the black stream
Over the jagged gashes of gray rock
Whirled shriekingly—and the close air seemed filled
With viewless phantoms of accursed things.
We, wandering, found a weird magnificence
Even amid its horrors; for we clothed
Each dim, surrounding object with the hues
Of our own worship—and the things that else
Had seemed most darksome and unlovely, were,
By our great love, transfigured to divine.

Rose-shadowed, in the dreamy silences,
What long, long hours we paced the orient vale,
Robed in its Eden-splendor of rich bloom!
The amber moon hung low i' the mid-heaven;
Long, crimson blossoms of pomegranate boughs
Swung, censor-like, above us; and we saw,
Afar in the dim south, the long, sharp line
Of castellated rocks, keen-piercing through
The silver-veined tissues of the night:
We caught blue glimpses of the hills beyond;
And like a diamond set in the cleft heart
Of an emerald, the tiny lake shone out,
Its clear, unshadowed crystal mirroring
A sky aflame with stars. We heard the low,
Soft plashing of the waves against the shore;
And caught snow-gleamings of an odorous weight
Of milk-white lilies, stirred by the slow tide. INA.

TOLD BY SIR WALTER SCOTT.—A Scottish clergyman, whose name was not mentioned, had some years since been cited before an ecclesiastical assembly at Edinburgh, to answer to a charge brought against him of great irreverence in religious matters, and Sir Walter was employed by him to arrange his defense. The principal fact alleged against him was his having asserted in a letter, which was produced, that he considered Pontius Pilate a very ill-used man, as he had done more for Christianity than all the other nine Apostles put together! The fact was proved and suspension followed.

AN ALMANAC PREDICTION.—The story explaining the popularity of Dr. Francis Moore's Vox Stellarum runs thus:—Once upon a time, when the almanac was set up, the reader finding the weather for a certain day omitted, immediately sent off his boy to the doctor. The doctor was busy, and disliking the interruption, shouted out, "Put it down thunder and lightning." Thunder and lightning at this particular season of the year were as rare as snow at Sahara, but down went thunder and lightning, and sure enough the storm came according to announcement. This settled the question of the supremacy of almanacs, and "Moore's" still has, we suppose, a great many subscribers, especially among the "old folks."

EVERY-DAY PAPERS.

NUMBER ONE—WHICH CONCERNS SOMEBODY ELSE.

DOES it ever occur to you in walking through a crowded street, how queer it is you are not somebody else? Over this vast sea of human faces ebb and flow the tides of every felicity and every woe to which mortal flesh is heir; and in these quiet or boisterous waves we may always find a mirror truthfully reflecting ourselves.

All of us have the same narrow world—OURSELF—and our own; our four walls, the dearest spot on earth; our oldest son, who ornaments Yale and who is the greatest genius there, and who is rapidly striding towards the White House; our next boy, who is in the army fighting under the gallant Brigadier Smith, and who, when a scout was wanted for a perilous journey, bravely offered to lay down his life for the old flag and his beloved country—and there was not a dry eye in the whole army; our daughter, who is the finest-looking girl in town and who is so much admired, but is so fastidious that she refused Col. Jones, who was worth a hundred thousand dollars; our charming Felicia—not beautiful but gifted—who wrote that sweet poem on our dear little Posie that died and is gone to rest; and our—everything. And then, when the idea does occur that there is somebody besides ourselves, the wonderment comes why we are not that somebody.

Why are you not that portly broker coming down Clay street, confidentially telling the innocent Brown the enormous cropping of the great Gammon mine? The same love of the marvellous that coaxed impossible stories in the nursery from the exhaustless maid, the same wonderful faculty for manufacturing them wholesale out of nothing, you will perceive in these two men.

And here down the walk, bearing the odors of the Palm Land, saunter two negroes. Don't draw yourself away so scornfully away, madam! Length of heel or flatness of nose is nothing, philosophically considered. I observe the shawl she wears is very like your own. Hats, too!—let me see: real feathers and lace on each, I declare! And that gold-headed cane and sleek coat look like your own dear John's best suit hanging at home in the closet. And if this dear almond-eyed, olive-skinned yellow girl has an unfavorable kink in her hair that your hot irons will not give, or if her gushing contralto voice is not quite so clear as your own soprano, or if her new-mown hay is a trifle stronger than your sweet-briar—don't break that picture of Abraham Lincoln that hangs in your parlor, and hang Jefferson Davis in its place; but, my precious, just imagine yourself an African queen and your devoted John a king.

"Wide through the landscape of his dreams
The lordly Niger flowed;
Beneath the palm-trees on the plain
Once more a king he strode;
He heard the tinkling caravans
Descend the mountain road.

"And then at furious speed he rode,
Along the Niger's bank,
His bridle reins were golden chains,
And with a martial clank,
At each leap he could feel his scabbard of steel
Smiting his stallion's flank."

He might, and then he might not. Most likely, he might not.

Ah, here comes a royal Piute! Now, suppose I were an Indian. It would be so pleasant to be a Piute! Rhymers would tune their lyres, reporters would be after me, boys would wear feathers in their caps, and girls would give me their cartes de visite. I would be a Chieftain—now wooing some dusky Minne-ha-ha, now scalping a cowardly foe, now talking of the Great Spirit; or—if I could only be a squaw! Why wasn't I an Esquimaux catching fish on a double-toothed spear, with a bead-eyed pappoose at my back? Then some tender young poet might have dipped his flamingo quill and sung of me. I would chase the antelope and follow the roe—a child of Nature; wild doves would flock at my call; rainbow-dyed flowers would spring in my path; my berry-decked hair, my bare feet, "like dew on the gowan lying," a hundred lyres would sing. No references to blubber or raw fish; no hints of black huts where a dozen dusky angels swelter round a lamp-oil flame; no faint allusion to frontier balls where savage whites and half-civilized savages meet! No, no! Ever shy, and on the wing—a fawn, with startled eye, looking from the distance—a passage-bird, hovering, afraid to alight—a sun-fish dodging the bait—in short, a Mrs. John Wood at the Broadway, playing "Pocahontas," with her hair brushed at the rate of two dollars an hour, (in greenbacks,) and the jewels of Ball & Black making a queen of her. Ah, who wouldn't?

But there comes a pig-tail! O Fate, why wasn't I a pig-tail, with his mingled odor of poppy and roast hog, and his sea-sick voice? Bah! I never hear one but I think of that great leveller, sea-sickness, when the kind advice of the steward is to eat cod-fish and raw cabbage, and the mild hints of the stewardess lean lime-ward; when seeing through a wash-bowl darkly the captain's voice comes faintly, talking of getting on "sea-legs," and earth, sea and air go a "bummin' away," like Tennyson's farmer.

And speaking of poets, a friend of mine, after a severe fit of sea-sickness, in sheer desperation, wrote the following

ODE TO THE PACIFIC:

Oh, strangely misnamed sea!
Whoever dared to call thy waves pacific,
Deserves forevermore compelled to be
Rocked by thy fierce gales, and thy storms terrific,
And at the last in some great fog be lost,
And barely reach (upon a log) thy coast.

"Cradled upon the deep!"
Ye gods! deliver me from such a cradle!
Where the mad waves like savage tigers leap,
And billows lift you like a giant ladle;
And all the elements of sea combine
To turn your whole identity to brine.

"Life on the ocean wave!"—
Let 's waive the subject; what is more disgusting
Than gusts at sea, where every man's a slave
To whims of weather and the queer adjusting—

And here this touching ode was interrupted. But I was talking of Chinamen—no, it was why I wasn't somebody else besides myself; and the more I think of why I wasn't, the more agreeable I think it would be if I was. I think I would like to merge my identity in that dirty-faced young Newton, who by that fruit-stand is sublimely reflecting on the possible downfall of an apple from that questionably-solid pyramid.

A great aunt of mine remembers the pillage of her native town, by the great trouble she had to save a pink gingham dress. What to her were the great struggles of the grand heroes of the Revolution, with their blood-tracks on the snow, compared to the frock she wore on Sundays! Who can help envying a child? No weeping for the woes of yesterday—no caring for the dread to-morrow; but "just give me my new mittens, mother, and let me snow-ball to-day, and I don't care if I have the croup to-night;" or "let me eat all the cherries I want, an I don't care if I am sick;" or, "buy me some rock candy, and get my doll a new bonnet, and I'll give you every cent of money out of my bank," and so on. Whether it would be desirable to be forever in that never-care-for to-morrow state of mind is a question; but it would be a change, and change is very refreshing, particularly in these legal-tender times.

But "night draws on apace," as Mrs. Henry Wood says in her last novel, and I have not found any satisfactory reason why I am not somebody else: should any one else find out before I do they may send the reason to the address of VANADIUM—ITS DISCOVERY AND IDENTITY.—This is a rare metal discovered by Del Rio in a Mexican red ore, and named by him "Erythronium" in 1801, but Collet-Descotels asserted it to be Chromium. In 1830, Seffstrum discovered it in iron ore and gave it its present name after Vanadis, the Scandinavian Venus. Since then, Wohler has determined the identity of erythronium and vanadium, it having been found by him in peehurane, by Gustav Rose, in the pyromorphite of Beresom, and by M. Canaval in the lead ore of Carinthia. We learn now that it has been found by M. Deville in the ferruginous clays in the South of France, and in the flower-pots made of gentilly clay, the first time it has been observed in tertiary strata. In the Journal de Pharmacie notes are published describing the properties of this metal and its compounds, based on experiments made by M. M. Czuduowicz and Rammelsberg.

INCIDENTS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

NUMBER THREE.

PRECIPITATE CAPTURES DUVILIER'S ASSASSIN.

AFTER the men of Wred's command had given vent to their indignation at the murder of their late comrade, Adolph Duvilier, they rode aloug the edge of the fields belouging to the Sucor hacienda, till they reached the entrance to the defile by which they came the night belore. The corporal reasoned that this road could never have been designed simply to cut off a few miles of travel to Sucor's place, (espccially as that gentleman knew nothing of its existence,) and determined to make a thorough reconnoissance of the adjacent country by daylight. Dismissing his guide here, whom he directed to proceed to Vera Cruz by the main road, and inform the commanding officer what had transpired, he filed his squad through the light coppice surrounding the entrance and soon was retracing his way in the direction of Vera Cruz. Except an occasional jingling of stirrups and sabres, and once in a while the neighing of a horse as they plodded through the sand, a gloomy silence pervaded the whole scene. The prospect around them afforded but little to please the eye or excite the imagination. One object, however, arrested Wred's attention and served to keep awake his thoughts. It was a solitary oak —the sole survivor, perhaps, of a forest of his kind that onee derived their sustenance from the soil, but now, alas! supplanted by a tribe of worthless scrubs—which stood off the road some thirty rods, towering its majestic head and branches high above the dwarfed and fruitless mesquit clustering round his base, and intertwining their sinewy arms to shut out from his trunk the sun's revivifying rays. It seemed to Wred's imagination (which was yet somewhat enlivened by the good cheer of the night before) to assume the shape of a frowning giaut, full of vengeful meaning, beckoning him to approach, and pointing its shrunken fingers to soue hated objcct in the distance.

But this train of thought, combined with the scorching rays of a tropical sun and loss of rest, was ealculated to reduce him to a state of dreamy languor, unsnited to the work before him. Turning to "Johnny Pi," who was a living eneyclopædia of anecdotes, but now wearing a visage that would be invaluable to an undertaker, he requested that worthy to try and rouse the spirits of the party by the application of a little wholesome humor.

"It won't do, Corp.," replied the joker; "that affair this moruing rung all the music out of me. I don't believe I'll ever crack another joke."

"It was a sad piece of work, Johnny, but we'll have to stand it in this business," replied the corporal.

"I suppose we must, Precip. But if any more of the boys are snaked out that way—well, 'twill drive me to strong drink, that's all," said the typo, musingly.

Just then a light breeze wafted the fumes of burning wood across the road, and Wred, halting his party, cautioned them to silence, intimating his belief that the euemy were near. Dismountiug, he stripped off his accoutrements, and taking a strong bowie-knife, cut his way through the chaparral in the direction of the oak tree, leaving his men standing in the road. Penetrating the thick uudergrowth was tedious work, but he finally accomplished it, and found the jagged sides of the old oak as easy to climb, almost, as a flight of steps. Getting into the topmost fork, his eyes were relieved by a magnificent landscape view of hill and vale, "with verdure clad," the dense undergrowth, of uniform height throughout the whole expanse, bending their slender tops to the breeze like a field of waving grain. A network of tortuous trails, narrow and serpentine in their course like the one on which he left his men, was barely distinguishable, and the care taken to eonceal the points where they intersected each other denoted that they were made for nefarious purposes. Taking out his note-book, the eorporal sketched the general eourse of these trails, which seemed to lead to a valley beyond his view, and was so interested in his work that he almost forgot the immediate object of his search—the source from which the smoke procceded. Looking in that direction, he discovered a pile of smouldering embers in front of a small shanty, surrounded by an open space of fifty or sixty yards. A trail to it conneeted with the road on which his men were stationed, about a hnndred rods from where he left them. He counted eight horses tied to the bnshes near the shanty, and only one man was visible. Hastily descending, he returned to his party and informed them of his discovery. Approaching the spot where the small lateral trail led off to the habitation, he dismounted all of his men but three, (whom he left in the road with the horses,) and, divesting themselves of their sabres, took their carbines and pistols, and, as stealthily as tigers, crept down upon the unsuspecting Mexicans. They ranged themselves to spring simultaneously into the shanty and capture its occupants before they could possibly reach their horses. At a signal from Precipitate they made a rush into the shed with a yell calculated to frighten the occupants out of a year's growth. Lying round upon their serapes were eight wounded Mexicans, unable to rise. One of the party, only, was unhurt, and he promptly, with very little agitation under the eireumstances, annouueed in good English that he would surrender as a prisoner of war. The corporal demanded to know who and what he was? The man replied that he was a surgeon in Padre Jarauta's brigade of partisans, (guerrillas,) and that the men with him were wounded the night before at Sucor's hacienda.

"Give me your arms, then," said the corporal, "and I will accept you as prisoners of war."

The men entered and took possession of the weapons of each man, and the surgeon handed over a dagger and pistol to Wred, and asked him what he proposed to do with the wounded.

"Are these men in a condition to be removed?" inquired Wred of the surgeon.

"They will suffer more by remaining here," was the reply.

"If I remove them to Sucor's hacienda, is it in your power to guarantee protection to that geutleman from future raids by your partisans?"

"I will give him a certificate that will insure him respect from Jarauta's men," replied the guerrilla.

Just at this moment Johnny Pi rushed in from the thicket in a state of excitement that for a time caused general confusion.

"Which one of you black devils elaims that horse in the thicket beyond?"

"I do!" said the surgeon, defiantly.

"Then you're my meat!" said Johnny, and instantly levelling his pistol, he fired at the guerrilla's head—only knocking his hat off, however.

"Stop, sir!" said Wred, seizing the infuriate dragoon by the arm. "Explain yourself, instantly!"

"Corporal," said he, with deep emotion, "Adolph Duvilier's horse stands there in the chaparral, still wet with its owner's heart's blood, and there stands his murderer. I have sworn vengeance, and by—"

"Kill him, Johnny! kill him!" said the men, with one voice.

"You shall not kill him!" said the eorporal.

"What, Precip.! will you protect the assassin of your friend?" said one of the men, and a mutinous scowl sat on the faces of the whole party.

"Hear me, comrades! This man has surrendered to me as a prisoner of war—I have his weapons, and he is defenseless. If he is murdered, however guilty he may be, you and I and our company will be disgraced."

"To h—ll with such fine-spun sentiments!" said one of the men, cocking his pistol.

"Put up your weapon, yon mutinous devil, or I'll send you there!" exclaimed the eorporal, now becoming excited. "You who intend to obey my orders, file off here to the right!—Quick—march!"

One after another the men sullenly obeyed the order.

"Now, sir," said the corporal, addressing the guerrilla, who stood calmly watching the proceedings, "what have you to say on this matter?"

"Señor Corporal," he replied, "I killed that man, but it was a matter of necessity with me. Hear my reasons: this morning I approached the hacienda to discover whether your party had left. My companions brought these wounded men to this spot aud left them in my eare, and I desired to get some of the servants of Don Estevan to assist me. I crept to the spot where your sentinel was stationed, and was face to face with him before we saw each other. Before he could draw his weapon I plunged my knife in his bosom. Had I not done so, he would certainly have killed me. I regret it now exceedingly, since I learn his name. Was Adolph Duvilier from New Orleans?"

"He was," replied Wred. "Why do you ask?"

"I know his brother and sister well," continued the surgeon; "I spent two winters in New Orleans, attending medical lectures, and was frequently thrown in their society. I have often heard them speak of their brother Adolph." Turning to the men, he said: "I appeal to you, soldiers; am I an assassin?—did not the circumstances justify me? Could any of you have acted otherwise?"

"Don't appeal to us, you infernal hell-hound!" said Johnny; "if it were not for Corporal Wred you would meet your doom this instant."

Precipitate now put an end to further parley by directing his men to lash the wounded Mexicans upon their horses with as much eare as possible; and within half an hour the whole cavalcade were in motion for Sucor's hacienda. The eorporal tied the surgeon's arms and mounting him on Duvilier's horse, which he led, moved on at the head of the eommand. Finding his prisoner disposed to be communicative, he said:

"Doctor, I am astonished that a man of your attainments should be identified with a service so disreputable. These guerrillas are nothing less than robbers."

With all due respect, Señor Corporal, yon are not so well qualified as myself to judge of my duties as a professional man. The men composing this guerrilla corps are actuated by various motives; but you must admit they are justified in resisting a foreign invasion."

"They have not the eourage to fight our soldiers, but show their patriotism in attacking our trains and picking up poor stragglers that fall in the rear of their commands. They were a terror to the women and unarmed men at Sucor's last night, but proved a cowardly set of curs when a dozen dragoons came upon them."

"We were surprised at your coming," said the gnerrilla, "and supposed you were in greater force. We had information that a full company of dragoons left the beach at dusk, and naturally supposed you to be that party. As for Don Estevan Sucor, he is immensely rich, and instead of supporting his government in her troubles, is making money by supplying its enemies with provisions. He is not entitled to friendly consideration at the hands of true Mexicans."

"He acted like a Christian gentleman last night," said the corporal, "and I feel certain that he will treat these deluded ereatures of yours with humanity."

"Yes, he will do it to secure protection in the future. But as to his Christianity I have my doubts. He belongs to a class who have at different ages worshipped at whatever shrine would justify and protect them in extorting from the poor and ignorant the fruits of their toil: yesterday, a brazen serpent or a fiery dragon; to-day, a lamb-like Saviour; to-morrow, it may be, the Devil, himself! I have no fears of his mistreating these men; he will regard this circumstance as an exceedingly fortunate one; and further, I am certain he would eash an order from me for a thousand dollars, if that sum would secure my release."

"Perhaps, it will not cost so much. Your profession will be taken into consideration by the commander at Vera Cruz, and you will no doubt soon be liberated," said the corporal.

"But I would prefer making this old aristocrat pay my ransom," said the doctor, slowly and cautiously; "and besides, you and your brave men should be entitled to something for saving his property last night."

There was a pause of some minutes in the conversation. Wred finally broke out with—

"Doctor, I saved you from the fury of my comrades a while ago, because you bore yourself like a true man. I made up my mind not to insult you by asking you to betray the secrets of your partisans. But you have somehow formed a pretty rough estimate of my integrity, and I feel inclined to 'play the string out' with you."

"Señor corporal, do not misinterpret my meaning," said the guerrilla, turning pale in the face and losing all self-control.

"No, sir; I understand you perfectly. You have by a dishonorable proposition forfeited all claim to my respect, and I shall withhold my protection unless you impart all necessary information about the villainous gang with which you have been connected."

Wred's tone and manner were marked with such earnestness and determination that the guerrilla weakened. He then told the corporal the locality of their headquarters, the number of men enrolled, their agents in Vera Cruz, and explained the points to which the trails led which Wred had discovered while up the tree.

After obtaining this information, which he carefully made a note of, the corporal assured the doctor that it was not an uncommon thing, where he came from, for a man to be as ugly as the devil and yet have correct ideas of honor and honesty. "If I were on the make, you see, doctor, the information I have squeezed out of you would pay me much better than what you first proposed. But you may rest easy. No one shall know from me the source of it but my commanding officer."

The surgeon hung his head like a rogue who had been caught in his own snare. The balance of the road was traversed in silence. When they arrived at the hacienda, Don Estevan promptly acquiesced in the corporal's plan, agreeing to procure surgical aid for his deluded and suffering countrymen, and expressed his belief that the surgeon's guarantee would protect him from future trouble. The surgeon, (whom Don Estevan knew and treated with profound respect,) only exacted of him that he should not reveal to any of the dragoons his name on account of the unfortunate circumstance of the night before.

The party were soon in the saddle, with the solitary prisoner, winding their way through the devious trails in the direction of their company's quarters on the beach. It was near nightfall before they reached the captain's marquee, and the party, dismounting, refreshed themselves, and regaled their comrades with an account of their exploits. Precipitate explained to the "old man," (who had been out with the company, but was unable to find the road indicated in his order,) the nature of the information he had gleaned.

"Well, Wred, you have performed your duty well," said Capt. D.; but if I communicate this to headquarters I will certainly be detailed to remain in this pestiferous region during the war, and I would much prefer going on to the City of Mexico when the army takes up its line of march. However, if you would be content to remain here, I will endeavor to procure a commission for you, and you may win distinction in this branch of service."

"I feel grateful, Captain," said the corporal; "but I would prefer remaining with the company and taking the chances with the rest of the boys."

"Very well, then. I will communicate the points to my successor after I shall have received orders to leave here. In the meantime, use all diligence to hunt these guerrillas out of the Department."

Here a sergeant entered and announced that the company were in a state of violent commotion, threatening to hang the prisoner in revenge for Duvilier's death. The captain stepped out and ordered the squad to escort their prisoner to Vera Cruz immediately, and deliver him into the custody of the officer of the day.

Wred prepared to accompany the party, but the captain ordered him to remain till roll-call, when his promotion would be announced as Second Sergeant of the company.

"But, Captain," said Precipitate, "that position is already filled by Jones, 'the Preacher;' the boys all respect him, and I would not, under any circumstances, like to incur his ill-will."

"Never mind Jones," he replied; "he shall be provided for in the non-commissioned staff. Jones is getting too old for active service, and the Quartermaster will find a position for him better suited to his tastes."

The squad now drew up before the captain's tent, with their prisoner securely bound. Capt. D. instructed Johnny Pi to take command of the party till "Sergeant" Wred relieved him, and to take good care of the prisoner.

The guerrilla surgeon gave a look of unutterable despair as he passed Wred, and soon the party disappeared in the darkness of the night.

At tattoo roll-call the name of "Wred—Precipitate," was followed by the announcement of his promotion to be Second Sergeant. His comrades bestowed the most flattering congratulations upon him. But he manifested anxiety to rejoin his men, who had now some two hours start of him. Mounting his horse, he started off alone at a gallop, soon reaching Vera Cruz, where he found his command holding a "whispering caucus."

"Where is your prisoner?" he inquired of Johnny Pi.

"Lost!" said he. "We did our d—dest, Precip, I assure you, but he escaped."

"I feared this result, and it is my duty to have the affair investigated," said Wred.

"Well, here are ten witnesses to prove my assertion," was his reply. * * *

Next day Wred sent home an account of Adolph Duvilier's death to his sister. Returning from the post-office, he met "Picayune Murphy," a well-known retailer of ardent spirits, who told him that he feared there was something wrong with Johnny Pi.

"Why do you think so, Murphy?" inquired the dragoon.

"He came to my store this morning, apparently sober but laboring under great agitation of mind, and bought a pickle-jar full of pure alcohol; he didn't say what he wanted with it, but if he drinks it, you'll certainly lose a good man if he is a poor soldier," was the reply.

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in matnrity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, reudering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhanst the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or hulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeatic agent, when applied to the human body, is new too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

MRS. HENDRICKS,

No. 629 MISSION STREET,

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Hendricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

LEAVES FROM "PODGERS'" JOURNAL.

A BEAUTIFUL sunny morning in November, 1849, found me walking up and down the Levee at New Orleans, with a dreadful headache consequent upon a "slightnous" partieipatiou the night before in a fancy dress ball at Lafayette, including the "trimmings." I was waiting for the departure of the little Government steamer Hetzel, ou whieh I purposed making a trip to Brazos Santiago aud Mexico. The captain came at last and ordered the "fasts" east off, and we were soon steaming down the Mississippi at a terrible rate—very nearly keeping up with an old log floating down, on which sat a dignified bull-frog, who did not condescend to notice our frantie efforts to pass him.

Our voyage down the river, and for a day or two after getting into the Gulf, was uninteresting; but the third we took a gale that knocked us about and drove us from our eourse for three days louger, when, finding we were unable to make head against it, and fuel getting low, we "kept away" for Galveston, which lay under our lee. We were two days finding it, but arrived safely, without any material damage, the only incident worthy of mention being the advent of a jnvenile, who came into the world the evening previous to reaeliing port. The mother, on being questioned as to who should be congratnla'ed as the "happy father," looked thoughtful. We voted the juvenile an appellation which the circumstances seemed to warrant, and we uamed him "Quien Sabe." The eaptain wanted to eharge him passage, but we all protested, and he finally reliuquished the idea.

Arrived at Galveston, I went on shore and took a room at that weary traveller's retreat called the Tremont House. The house was not very full, and the proprietor being a very methodical man, gave me the last room at the end of a very long hall on the second floor. There were plenty of vacant rooms nearer, and I asked to be put in one of them, but he said no; he always filled his rooms in rotation—the farthest one first, and so on up towards the street. I need not have gone any further to have found worse, and was sufficiently distant to fulfil the letter of that proverb. It was elegantly furnished, with a pitcher without any handle to it, a window without any curtain to it, a chair without any back to it, a mirror without any glass iu it, a door without any lock to it, a bed without any slats to it, a floor without any carpet to it, all of which corresponded with the wardrobe I had brought on shore, which consisted of a shirt without any collar to it, and I made up my mind there probably would be a bill without any receipt to it.

I had been on salt water allowance for a week, and when the gong rang for dinuer I made one of a party very early ou the ground floor, where the dinner was served. I seated myself in a chair, wheu a eolored person, with one of yesterday's napkins for an apron, very politely informed me that was Gen. Jones' seat. I moved to another, a duplicate of the aforesaid; that was Col. Smith's seat. I moved on agaiu to a distant chair, as I supposed so far that it could uot beloug to anything higher in rank than a "high private," and with him I was prepared to contest the point. But alas! I had only got myself fairly seated before Ebony No. 3 told me that seat belonged to Major Fizzle. I inquired whether Major Fizzle was a small man or a large man, and was exceedingly gratified to learn he was a little under size and rather sickly. I kept that chair. When dinner was about half finished, or rather when I had about half finished my dinner and entirely finished everything in reach, a man eame iu and approaehed my position. He looked at me—I looked at him in as dignified a manner as was possible for a gentleman who was at that moment employed in mastieating a very large piece of potato which gave him the appearance of having the toothache. He wore a shabby old military frock-eoat and the air of one who thought twice before he said anything. He seated himself, looked fixedly at me, raised his plate with his right hand, grasped a knife with his left, and half turning in his ehair towards me, in a voice of thunder, exclaimed: "Corned beef, fat!"

After dinner I met an acquaintance I had known in Mexico, "previously before," who invited me to his house to take tea. I accompanied him home, and was introduced into the "buzzum of his family," which consisted of a young lady from Boston, who had come out to astonish the natives of Texas, his wife, and a Texan crop of children. My friend played "somewhat" on the violin, and after tea, (a hearty supper, which, after that dinner, nearly killed me,) the ehairs were set back, and I was invited to dance with the young lady. She wore ringlets, and when we "polkered" those ringlets dangled in my face, and I was more than ever impressed with the idea that the famous Boston hair pomatum (its component parts being goose-grease and peppermint) might be a very pleasant article to use at a distance, but so close to one's olfactories it was not. While amusing myself and being amused, it began to rain, and only as it can rain in Texas. Ten o'elock came, and it still poured. There was no other way to do but to make a dash for the hotel. I started—it was pitch dark; the umbrella I had immediately performed after the manner of umbrellas generally in a high wind—that is, it turned inside out, and then departed altogether, leaving me nothing but the handle. In going a hundred yards, I fell into at least fifty puddles of mud and water, varying in depth from six inches to three feet. I went in all sorts of shapes; sometimes head first, sometimes lengthwise, and frequently all under. I lost my way, my hat, and floundered about for two hours, until I made a light ahead, which proved to be the abode of a eolored gentleman, who I persuaded with a five dollar piece to pilot me to the Tremont House, on reaching whieh I found myself rather damp. A waiter who was up accompanied me to my room, and on the promise of a dollar, agreed to dry my moist garments by the kitehen fire and bring them to my room at 7 o'clock next morning. I was awakeued by the first gong, (I wish the man was iu Oakland or Shasta that made the second one, and somebody had accnsed him of stealing a mule,) sprang up, and looked about for my elothes. They were not there. I retired again, thinking my colored friend would soon be along; but I lay until long after the seeond bell had rung, and hearing no signs, resolved to emulate Mrs. Dombey (supposing she had followed Mrs. Chick's adviee) and make "an effort." I threw up the window and hallooed; I put my head in the hall and hollered "Waiter!" I pounded on the floor; I raised a devil of a racket geuerally. It was no go. I went to bed again in despair, and there I waited another hour. At last I got desperate, and hungry, too. I put my head out into the hall and listeued. Thinks I, if I can only get to the head of the stairs and back safely, I cau rouse somebody, and the sequel proves I did. Winding myself up iu a sheet, I made a dash for the head of the stairs, reached it, hollered fire! waiter! landlord! until I heard a faint response from the depths below. I turned to returu, when oh, horror! what shonld I see coming down the hall towards me, but a very substantial, matronly-looking woman. What was to be doue? She was between me aud my room. I rushed to the first door near me, and tried it; it was loeked. The next wasn't; but I came near getting myself into a "muss" that time. Never mind who or what I saw; if somebody didn't look fascinating at dinner, it was not from any neglect of her toilet that day. I tried one more door; a man started up pistol in hand. I was getting desperate. I hesitated between running the risk of being shot, or running the gauntlet. I ehose the latter, and made a rush for my room. As I approached the lady before mentioned: she started back, threw up her hands, then, with a terrible scream, down she came like a 74-pounder on the floor. It was no time to be gallunt. I cleared the old lady at a bound, left her screaming fire, murder, and several other things; reached my room, slammed to the door, piled the bed, table, chairs, etc., against it, barrieaded myself, seized the pitener for a weapon, and prepared to sell my life dearly.

I pass over the rush of people to the old lady's assistance, the excitements at her having seen a ghost, the wonder who it was, where it went to, how it came there aud the subsequent arrival of the darky with my clothes just before dinner; how he had burued my shoes so they turned up at the toes and looked me in the face, and came to pieces when I tried to put them on.

I procured a pair of slippers, and went down to dinner. I was very hungry, and in my eagerness to reach a dish ou the other side of the table, I stretched out my arm, and heard something tear, but did not notice it at the moment. Soon after, in leaning over for the butter, I heard another sound like a rip, and at the same time had a cooling sensation. A series of similar sounds followed, and when at last I rose to leave, I buttoned up my coat with the air of a man who had dined to his satisfaetion. As I did so, the sense of "free ventilation" again stole over me, and my coat seemed very loose. At the sound of tittering and langhing, I turned ronnd to see what caused so much merriment, and observed every one at the table looking at me. I felt very indignant and exceedingly belligerent, at the same time dreadfully puzzled; but putting on a defiunt air, I marched out with the step of a tragic hero. As I closed the door there was a tremendous guffaw. I collared a passing darky and shook him for five minutes, considering that I was shaking by proxy the entire dining-room; then, with what breath I had left, requested him to state, in as few and as concise words as possible, why I should be langhed at in that honse in that manuer. The darky, half frightened and considerably choked as he was, showed his ivory and yah, yah'd.

"I guess, massa to-tore he pan-pantaloons!"

I looked at myself, and I rather guess massa had tore he pantaloons. A glance horrified me, and the mystery was explained. My pants were split entirely across the knees, and elsewhere. My coat was worse; it had dissolved partnership and was only connected by the collar. I made a rush for my room, and it was lucky it was no farther off, for that suit of clothes lasted me just to my door and no further, and by the time I pitched in head-foremost, I was all ready for bed again, aud to bed I went. The darky had burued my clothes to a cinder, and they had entirely dropped off. The natural supposition is, that I immediately sent for a new suit, or aboard the steamer for my trunk. I had but ten dollars in my pocket when I came ashore, five of which I had expended, and there was no communication with the steamer; the wind was blowing a gale. I tried to negotiate a purchase for a suit, and referred to my fiddling friend; but I discovered his eredit, because he was known, was just as bad as mine because I wasn't. What was to be done? My friend and counsellor, Ebony, was again called in, and through him arranged for the loan of a dilapidated overcoat and a boat to take me off to the steamer at daylight next morniug, for which I was to hypothecate my remaining five-dollar piece. About snndown I was waited on by a committee, and invited to be their guest at a cotillon party that evening. I presume I was indebted to my friend the fiddler for the politeness, but regretted exeeedingly a violent attaek of rheumatism would prevent my attending, etc., etc. Just about daylight next morning, in stocking-feet, buttoned up to the chin and down to my heels in Cuff's overcoat, (it was one of the regular Shanghais,) I stole down stairs, unlocked the door, and made tracks for the wharf. The boatman was there, and transferred me to the steamer, and in half un hour we were on our way coastwise.

I learned subsequently that my absquatulation produced a great exeitement in the hotel, and that a fork and two spoons were missed; but I most solemnly declare I not only did not steal the "first spoon," but I subsequently remitted the full amount of my bill to the proprietor of the Tremont House, and, in a spirit of generosity not equalled, presented him with a full title to the suit of elothes I had left in pledge on my bed-room floor.

WAITING FOR THE SHIP.

A FORT POINT IDYL.

ABOUT an hour's ride from the Plaza there is a high bluff with the ocean breaking uninterruptedly along its rocky beach. There are several cottages on the sands which look as if they had recently been cast up by a heavy sea. The cultivated patch behind each tenement is fenced in by bamboos, broken spars and drift-wood. With its few green eabbages aud turnip-tops, each garden looks something like an aquarium with the water turned off. In fact you would not be surprised to meet a merman digging among the potatoes, or a mermaid milking a sea cow hard by.

Near this place formerly arose a great semaphoric telegraph with its gaunt arms tossed up against the horizon. It has been replaced by an observatory, connected with an electric nerve to the heart of the great commercial city. From this point the incoming ships are signaled, and again checked off at the City Exchange. And while we are here looking for the expected steamer, let me tell you a story.

Not long ago, a simple, hard-working mechanic, had amassed sufficient by diligent labor in the mines to send home for his wife and two children. He arrived in San Francisco a month before the time the ship was due, for he was a Western man and had made the overland journey aud knew little of ships or seas or g les. He procured work in the city, but as the time approached he would go to the shipping office regularly every day. The month passed, but the ship came not; then a month and a week, two weeks, three weeks, two months, and then a year.

The rough, patient face, with soft lines overlying its hard features, which had become a daily apparition at the shipping agent's, then disappeared. It turned up one afternoon at the observatory as the setting sun relieved the operator from his duties. There was something so childlike and simple in the few questions asked by this stranger, touching his business, that the operator spent some time to explain. When the mystery of signals and telegraphs was unfolded, the stranger had one question more to ask. "How long might a vessel be absent before they would give up expecting her?" The operator couldn't tell; it would depend on circumstances. Would it be a year? Yes, it might be a year, and vessels had been given up for lost after two years and had come home. The stranger put his rough hand on the operator's, aud thanked him for his "troubil" and went away.

Still the ship came not. Stately clippers swept into the Gate, and merchantmen went by with colors flying, and the welcoming gun of the steamer often reverberated among the hills. Then the patient face, with the old resigned expression, but a brighter, wistful look in the eye, was regularly met on the crowded decks of the steamer as she disembarked her living freight. He may have had a dimly-defined hope that the missing ones might yet come this way, as only another road over that strange unknown expanse. But he talked with ship captains and sailors, and even this last hope seemed to fail. When the careworn face aud bright eyes were presented again at the observatory, the operator, busily engaged, could not spare time to answer foolish interrogatories, so he went away. But as night fell, he was seen sitting on the rocks with his face turned seaward, and was seated there all that night.

When he became hopelessly insane, for that was what the physicians said made his eyes so bright, and wistful, he was eared for by a fellow-craftsmen who had known his troubles. He was allowed to indulge his fancy of going out to watch for the ship, in which she "and the children" were in at night when no one else was watching. He had made up his mind that the ship would come in at night. This, and the idea that he would relieve the operator who would be tired with watching all day, seemed to please him. So he went out aud relieved the operator every night!

For two years, the ships came and went. He was there to see the outward-bound clipper, and greet her on her return. He was known only by a few who frequented the place. When he was missed at last from his accustomed spot, a day or two elapsed before any alarm was felt. One Sunday, a party of pleasure seekers clambering over the rocks were attracted by the barking of a dog who had ran a few rods before them. When they came up they found a plainly dressed man lying there dead. There were a few papers in his pocket—chiefly slips cut from different journals of old marine memoranda—and his face was turned towards the distant sea.

BRET.

SCIENTIFIC SKETCHES.

LORD LYTTLETON, in his Dialogues of the Dead, makes "Darteneuf" say, in a conversation held with "Apicius," in Elysium, on the relative merits of the English and Roman mode of living, that in his opinion the true value of the discovery of America consisted in the fact that it gave turtle soup to the world. He tells the Roman to think of the new world of good things for eating and drinking that Columbus had opened to mankind, and bids him lament his hard fate, that he had not lived in such an age.

To this the Roman replies in kind; and after commiserating the degenerate days in which his English rival was born, when even the names of the Roman dishes, with other treasures of antiquity, were unknown and forever lost to the moderns, in solemn, swelling style dilates upon the splendid and costly feasts of Lucullus, who plundered all Asia to furnish new delicacies for his table, and who was only surpassed in the magnificence of his noble art of eating by his fellow-Roman Æsopus, by whose order a dish of singing-birds of great rarity was prepared at the cost of $22,215 in our money. Of singing-birds! It should have choked you, thou music murderer! But remember our turtle feasts, and despair!—for they were above all price; the most luscious of all food, the most grateful to the taste.

Thus for considerable length is the imaginary conversation between these two Elysian worthies carried on by the writer in a most agreeable way, with happy hits and pleasant conceits, illustrating the character of some personage or age in history.

How aptly has Lyttleton portrayed the Roman taste, cultivated to the highest refinement of luxury, when he makes the discussion of the value of the discovery of America turn upon a point of sensual gratification—and how greatly different is the view taken of it in an age of different feeling and sentiment! Some now estimate it highest in a political light, for its gift of constitutional liberty, of republican form, to Church and State, and as a refuge to man from civil and religious oppression. Some chiefly regard its politico-economical value for the purposes of exchange and barter of the commodities of different countries, and as the modern granary of the world, abundantly furnishing the raw materials of food and manufacture for the life, labor and comfort of millions in the older parts of the earth, where nature yields not at all, or but sparingly, by reason of exhaustion from excessive work. Its vast productions of the precious and useful metals to some give it its goodly look and prospect. To others invaluable as a source of sensation on a gigantic scale, "a sweet morsel to roll under their tongue"; to the lovers of the marvellous a rare treat to have a continent or two wherein all things leave the beaten track and seek new forms and qualities, in society marked by a free, frolicsome, at times boisterous tone, indicative of a new, fresh and untramelled order of being. For all these it has its charms because of one reason or another—to some because it unites all the elements of a pasture rich in pleasures and profit. But see! here comes a spirit of different look and temper on the scene—the spirit of Science in its pure and classic drapery, whose mien at once dispels all idea of selfish motive and disarms all rising antagonism. But more, its nature is not negative, for while admitting in some degree the merit of these respective claims to America's imperial domain, its own is enforced with a tone full of confidence, an eye kindling with the fire of enthusiasm, and a dignified, steadfast manner that silences all opposition as, with a wave of its arm over the broad field, the sign of its peculiar ownership, it calls upon the colossal works of her mountains, rivers and forests, and all her natural wonders, freaks, even eccentricities, to bear witness to the justice of its right to the highest and most honorable seat in the temple built on the solid foundation of her own rocky structure, and overlooking with unobstructed view the almost boundless expanse of her animal, vegetable and mineral kingdom. These are merely impressions, may be coldly uttered by the mind of the exact practical worker devoid of inspiration. Go to the proofs, for never was the injunction of "prove all things" more rigidly exacted than in this age, that calls everything false when not proven, and peculiarly prides itself on the inexorable character of its logic. Well, we accept the test, and in manner informal we say to the doubter who may wait for an answer, look at the splendid flora and fauna of North and South America, rivalling in their forms the most artistic and artificial designs known to the cunning hand of man, and in colors the iridescence of the rainbow itself—unapproached by creations of like kind on land or in the "uncontinented deep." The very form and structure of the continent speak to the same effect: two vast triangles in strange position to each other lying on the same line, pointing to the same direction, and connected where the apex of the one touches the base of the other by a narrow strip of land from which both oceans are discernible. In structure equally strange in their resemblance, by no means fanciful to the human body, with their gigantic backbone of rock stretching throughout their entire length, from which ribs of stony ridges start at intervals more or less regular, and watered by a system of river veins and arteries, unequalled elsewhere on earth. Springing from the Gulf of Mexico in mid-ocean, there flows mysteriously, for it mingles not with the adjacent waters, a warm river of rapid current, upon its bosom bearing the freighted cargoes of the world's commerce and giving to the European coasts a genial climate of soft and temperate character. But let us pass to matters of a more strictly scientific nature and notice but a few. Here the winds deserve notice, for whether gentle or violent, their regularity and periodical character in our country is very remarkable, both in their causes and effects, and their important bearing upon the business and pursuits of life. They are trade winds indeed, and well named. But "no man knoweth whither they come, or whither they go"; true, but the cause of their existence can be readily seen. Take our own summer winds of California for an illustration. In the morning, the land breeze blows from east to west, and in the afternoon, the reverse course is the rule. But why? simply, because, during the night, condensation of the atmospheric strata in contact with the cool water of the ocean has been constantly going on, and a partial vacuum created, sufficiently decided by morning to cause a flow of air from the land, which, having been more highly heated during the day, the condensation is there much less, and the air seeks by its western travel to restore the equilibrium; and hence the current of wind. This we will call the downward flow. Now, during the day, when the heating action of the sun has been sufficiently long in operation upon the atmosphere of the land, where its effect is more strongly felt than on the ocean, rarefaction of the air takes place, the warm currents ascend, causing a partial vacuum here, and the cool heavy air from the ocean streams in and establishes the existence of the wind with its eastern, or upward flow. This periodical change, the effect of condensation and expansion, cannot be better shown than by placing in changed position, thus, the letter ☜ of the alphabet, the right hand arm or curve of the letter representing the downward flow of air, or easterly wind of the morning, and the left hand arm or curve the upward flow, or westerly wind of the afternoon.

Again, see what important evidences of the earth's age have been furnished the geologist by the organic and inorganic fossil remains found in America. Sir Charles Lyell tells the story in fine language and on undoubted proof, when detailing the discovery, on the northwest coast of the main land of Guadaloupe, in the West Indies, of the skeleton remains of men in rock known to be daily forming. An astonishingly large number of gigantic mastodons have been found in the United States, imbedded in the early strata, of a size and in a state of preservation not known to any other country. On the shores of the Bay of Fundy fossil forests have been discovered of great scientific value, affording one of the finest examples in the world of a succession of fossil trees of the carboniferous period laid open to the sight of man.

This may be enough to sustain our view of the very great and peculiar value of America to science, but we cannot close this sketch without referring to the well-known fact of the foot-prints of birds in the new red sand-stone of Connecticut, found in many places, for an extent of eighty miles, and bearing most importantly upon the age of this formation.

TRISMEGISTUS.

NOTES OF MINES AND MINERALOGY.

IGNEOUS VS. AQUEOUS THEORY.—On the formation of granite, whether by fire or by water, the fight goes briskly on between the opposing parties, and a short time since we gave several pertinent questions put by a Fellow of the Geological Society to his opponents, as an argument against the igneous theory, for he evidently did not see how they could be answered, and had thrown them into this form for the sake of strength and brevity; but the answer, and a pointed one it is, has come from a partisan of the igneous theory, Mr. John Jones, a practical miner of Wales, who has lately shown himself to be as clever a writer as he is a forcible thinker on scientific matters of this nature. We will condense Mr. Jones' reply as well as may be done consistently with perspicuity. At first he regarded the "Fellow's" questions as so much irony—in, fact an innocent piece of badinage—but soon discovers on closer investigation that he is in earnest, and that really he is a Member of the Geological Society, but can scarcely think so from the "Fellow's" style and matter; but strange things sometimes happen, and, like the fossil-fly in amber, the wonder to Mr. Jones is, how the devil he got there.

Of the first question, "What were the conditions of the constituents of the granitic masses prior to the melting process?" he makes short work by asking another question. Why did not the "Fellow" at once ask what was the condition of matter before the world was made? That would have been as relevant to the subject as the question he has asked. We do not profess to go so far back; we hold that granite was once in a molten state, because it is found in sedimentary rocks in such a position as to leave no doubt that it came up through them, and because its internal structure resembles the products of furnaces and modern volcanoes. Anything beyond that is purely speculative.

To the second question, "What was the fuel employed?" as ready dispatch is given by the answer that it is utterly unscientific—for heat has no necessary connection with fuel—fuel is merely the substance we use to produce heat. Heat itself is always produced, more or less, by chemical combination, and the burning of fuel is nothing more than a chemical change, the combination of the oxygen of the air with the carbon of the fuel. He then refers the "Fellow" to Dr. Andrews' "Report on the Heat of Combination," where he will find some remarkable experiments showing the quantity of heat evolved in various chemical combinations, such as metallic precipitation and the union of acids and bases, and advises him to study before making further statements. So much, then, to show that fuel has no necessary or exclusive connection with heat. In the fusion of igneous rocks we have to do with the internal heat of the earth, which rests on observations very carefully made. These observations, however, have no bearing on the origin of that heat. We take the fact as we find it, and there is no room to doubt that there is sufficient heat at a given depth below the surface to fuse the most intractable rock, all the elements of which are found in modern volcanoes and in combinations resembling the igneous rocks of earlier periods.

The answer to the third question, "How were the constituent minerals moulded in prisms, rhombs and flakes?" is ejaculatory in its nature, sudden and forcible. Moulded into form! Good heavens! The "Fellow" has yet to learn that minerals have a definite geometrical form which they always take. But the difficulty to the "Fellow's" mind is evidently crystallization from fusion, although so far as chemical affinity is concerned it makes but little difference whether the minerals are in fusion or in solution. The "Fellow" would do well to slightly peruse, if no more, any of the elementary works we have on crystallography. To go more largely into this point would be an insult to the intelligence of others, if not to his.

The fourth question, "How was the silica of the feldspars and the micas kept separate from the quartz?" and the fifth question, "How were the alumina, iron, etc., of the mica kept separate, in definite proportions, from those constituting the feldspar?" should have formed one question; at any rate, in answering one the other is also answered. Why the elements of matter should combine in definite proportions is not yet known, but that they do is an indisputable fact. These propotions are invariable, and when the affinities are free to act the particles of matter arrange themselves into substances, determined by the combining proportions of the elements. That was the case with granite, the magma or crude organic matter from which it was formed containing the elements required for mica, feldspar and quartz. The mica was first crystallized, as is proved by its point of fusion, and took from the magma no more than was necessary for its formation. And in the same way both the feldspar and the quartz were formed. But look at a few examples. In Metallurgy, the great difficulty in making alloys is to prevent the metals composing the alloy from separating when slowly cooling. This difficulty is always felt in casting large bells. Many other instances might be named, such as a melted mixture of lead and tin, in any proportion, when allowed to slowly cool. But enough on this point, till "Fellow" can make more out of it for his side of the question, and in a form more definite than by mere innuendo.

In the sixth question the "Fellow" is caught palpably in misrepresentation when he asks, "How came the feldspar to contain upwards of 5 per cent. and the mica more than 3 per cent. of water, mineralogically or chemically combined?" for feldspar has no water whatever in combination, except when undergoing a change, and mica occasionally contains water to the amount of 4 per cent., but the presence of water does not appear to be characteristic of any particular kind of mica, the same kind of mica being sometimes hydrated, and sometimes anhydrous. A specimen of mica from Vesuvius, and of whose igneous origin there can be no doubt, was found to contain a very appreciable quantity of water. Is there anything inconsistent in water or the elements of water forming part of an igneous rock? Water is simply an oxide of hydrogen, or, in other words, 8 parts of oxygen and 1 part of hydrogen are in combination with the mineral elements, forming a crystal, say, of mica, or any other substance. Besides, rocks are everywhere permeated by water, as basalt, crystals of quartz, lime, etc., and are unceasingly undergoing change, often in a marvellous manner. We say again to the "Fellow," read Nature more carefully, and your opinions, though not quite so solid, may experience a still greater change.

To the seventh and last question, which is somewhat of a personal nature, "Will your correspondent, Mr. John Jones, inform us where melted granite can be seen in situ, so that we may go and see such an extraordinary phenomenon?" an answer of a personal nature was naturally due, and did not fail to come. The question is simply a piece of low-bred impertinence which might be fittingly replied to by sending the "Fellow" into the crater of Vesuvius, in the hope that somewhere about midway he might be gratified by seeing in situ what he fails to arrive at by the ordinary process of reasoning.

ALUMINIUM—NEW MODE OF EXTRACTION.—It is announced in the Cosmos that M. Corbelli has discovered a mode of extracting aluminium from clay more simple and economical than any before known, and which will much reduce the price of this metal. The clay is dried and submitted to the action of an acid to remove any iron it may contain. After the dissolution of the clay in the acid, and the deposition of the earthy matters, the liquid is poured off. The residuum is dried, then heated to about 500 degrees Centigrade, and afterwards mixed with 200 grammes of prussiate of potash, the quantity being in proportion to the quantity of silica contained in the clay. The mixture is heated in a crucible to a white heat, and, after cooling, the aluminium will be found at the bottom of the crucible.

CONDUCTION OF HEAT.—In relation to Dr. Tyndall's researches into heat, M. l'Abbe Laborde states that he heated to redness one end of a thin iron bar of such length that the other end could be held without burning the hand. When the red end was plunged into water the other end became so hot that he was compelled to drop it. The rapid compression of the hot metal, he says, is no doubt the cause of the elevation of temperature, but he asks if another cause may not be suspected, for instance, the creation of thermo-electric currents? For this purpose he made a rather rough experiment which is described in the 6th volume of Les Mondes.

SOMETHING WORTH HAVING.

TO have the sure esteem
Of those whose worth we know,
The heart will oft redeem
From many a doubtful throe;
The anxious soul declares
Some good must be in us,
Or, by such souls as theirs
We were not valued thus.

When brimming cups go round,
When friendly faces meet,
Where jest and smile abound,
Oh, if we there may meet
Such long-tried friend of years
To share with us the wine—
'Tis nectar then—and cheers
With influence divine!

Or, if oppressed with care
Or sickness, low we lie,
What med'cine can compare
With friendship's love-lit eye?
One fond plain English word
More cheers our suffering man
Than all the pomp absurd
Of doctor's Latin can.

Oh, bliss how bright, how rare,
Where friend like this appears,
With smiles our joy to share,
Or share our grief with tears:
To have this, is to win
From out our earthly strife
The brightest jewel in
That crown of thorns—called life!

[Samuel Lover.

AUDIENCES OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

OF the turbulence of audiences in those days, there are many evidences on record. It was sometimes provoked, at others altogether unjustifiable, and always more savage than humorous. In 1669, Mrs. Corey gratified Lady Castlemaine, by giving an imitation of Lady Harvey, throughout the whole of the part of "Sempronia," in Catiline's Conspiracy. Lady Harvey, much excited, had influence enough with her brother, Edward Montagu, Lord Chamberlain, to induce him to lock Mrs. Corey up, for her impertinence. On the other hand, Lady Castlemaine had still greater influence with the King; and not only was Mrs. Corey released, but she was "ordered to act it again worse than ever." "Doll Common," as the actress was called, for her ability in playing that part in the Alchymist, repeated the imitation, with the required extravagance, but not without opposition; for Lady Harvey had hired a number of persons, some of whom hissed Doll, while others pelted her with fruit, and the King looked on the while, amazed at the contending factions, whose quarrels subsequently brought him much weariness in the settling.

Then, again, much disturbance often arose from noisy, financial squabbles. It was the custom to return the price of admission to all persons who left the theatre before the close of the first act. Consequently, many shabby persons were wont to force their way in without paying, on the plea that they did not intend to remain beyond the time limited. Thence much noisy remonstrance on the part of the door-keepers, who followed them into the house; and therewith such derangement of the royal comfort, that a special decree was issued, commanding payment to be made on entering; but still allowing the patron of the drama to recover his money, if he withdrew on or before the close of the first act.

But there were greater scandals than these. On the 2d of February, 1679, there is a really awful commotion, and imminent peril to house and audience, at the Duke's theatre. The King's French favorite, the Duchess of Portsmouth, is blazing with rouge, diamonds and shamelessness, in the most conspicuous seat in the house. Some tipsy gentlemen in the street hard by, hear of her wit and handsome presence, and the morality of these drunkards is straightway incensed. The house is panic-stricken at seeing these virtuous Goths rushing into the pit, with drawn swords in one hand—flaming, smoking, ill-smelling torches, in the other; and with vituperative cries against "the Duchess of Portsmouth, and other persons of honor." The rioters, not satisfied with thrusting their rapiers at the arms, sides and legs of the affrighted people in the pit, hurl their blazing torches among the astounded actors on the stage! A panic and a general flight ensue. The house is saved from general destruction; but as it is necessary to punish somebody, the King satisfies his sense of justice by pressing hard upon the innocent actors, and shutting up the house during the royal pleasure!

Much liquor, sharp swords and angry tempers, combined to interrupt the enjoyment of many a peaceful audience. An angry word, passed, one April evening of 1682, between Charles Dering, the son of Sir Edward, and the hot-blooded young Welshman, Mr. Vaughan, led to recrimination and sword drawing. The two young fellows, not having elbow-room in the pit, clambered on to the stage, and fought there, to the greater comfort of the audience, and with a more excited fury on the part of the combatants. The stage was that of the Duke's company, then playing in Dorset Gardens. The adversaries fought on, till Dering got a thrust from the Welshman which stretched him on the boards; whereupon the authorities intervened, as there was no more mischief to be done, and put Master Vaughan under restraint, till Dering's wound was declared not to be mortal.

The 'tiring rooms of the actresses were then open to the fine gentlemen who frequented the house. They stood by at the mysteries of dressing, and commented on what they beheld and did not behold, with such breadth and coarseness of wit, that the more modest, or least impudent ladies, sent away their little handmaidens. The dressing over, the amateurs lounged into the house, talked loudly with the pretty orange-girls, listened when it suited them, and at the termination of the piece crowded again into the 'tiring room of the most favorite and least scrupulous of the actresses. Among these gallants who thus oscillated between the pit and the dressing-bowers of the ladies, was a Sir Hugh Middleton, who is not to be confounded with his namesake of the New River. On the second Saturday of February, 1667, Sir Hugh was among the joyous damsels dressing for the play, behind the stage of Old Drury. The knight was so unpleasantly critical on the nymphs before him, that one of them, sharp-tongued Beck Marshall, bade him keep among the ladies of the Duke's house, since he did not approve of those who served the King. Sir Hugh burst out with a threat, that he would kick, or what was worse, hire his footman to kick her. The pretty but angry Rebecca nursed her wrath all Sunday; but on Monday she notified the ungallant outrage to the great champion of insulted dames, the King. Nothing immediately came of it; and on Tuesday, there was Sir Hugh, glowering at her from the front of the house, and waylaying her as she was leaving it with a friend. Sir Hugh whispers a ruffianly-looking fellow, who follows the actress, and presses upon her so closely, that she is moved by a double fear—that he is about to rob, and perhaps stab her. A little scream scares the bravo for a minute or so. He skulks away, but anon slinks back; and, armed with the first offensive missile he could pick up in a Drury Lane gutter, he therewith anoints the face and hair of the much shocked actress, and then, like the valiant fellows of his trade, takes to his heels. The next day, sweet as Anadyomene rising from the sea, the actress appeared before the King, and charged Sir Hugh with being the abettor of this gross outrage. How the knight was punished, the record in the State Paper office does not say; but about a fortnight later a royal decree was issued which prohibited gentlemen from entering the 'tiring rooms of the ladies of the King's theatre. For some nights the gallants sat ill at ease among the audience; but the journals of the period show that the nymphs must have been as little pleased with this arrangement as the fine gentlemen themselves, who soon found their way back to pay the homage of flattery to the most insatiable of goddesses.

Not that all the homage was paid to the latter. The wits loved to assemble, after the play was done, in the dressing-rooms of the leading actors with whom they most cared to cultivate an intimacy. Much company often congregated here, generally with the purpose of assiguing meetings, where further enjoyment might be pursued.

Then, when it was holiday with the legislature, the house was filled with parliament-men. On one of these occasions, Pepys records, "how a gentleman of good habit, sitting just before us, eating of some fruit in the midst of the play, did drop down as dead; but with much ado, Orange Moll did thrust her finger down his throat, and brought him to life again." This was an incident of the year 1667.

Returning to the front of the stage, we find the ladies in the boxes subjected to the audible criticisms of "the little cockerells of the pit," as Ravenscroft calls them, with whom the more daring damsels entered into a smart contest of repartees. As the "play-house" was then the refuge of all idle young people, these wit-combats were listened to with interest, from the town fops to the rustic young squires who came to the theatres in cordovant gloves, and were quite unconscious of poisoning the affected fine ladies with the smell of them. The poets used to assert that all the wit of the pittites was stolen from the plays they read or saw acted. It seemed the privilege of the box-loungers to have none, or to perform other services; namely, to sit all the evening by a mistress, or to blaze from "Fop's corner," or to mark the modest women, by noting those who did not use their fans through a whole play, nor turn aside their heads, nor, by blushing, discover more guilt than modesty. Thrice happy was she who found the greatest number of slaves at the door of her box, waiting obsequiously to hand or escort her to her chair. These beaux were hard to fix, so erratic were they in their habits. They ran, as Gatty pertinently has it, "from one play-house; and if they like neither the play nor the women, they seldom stay any longer than the combing of their perriwigs or a whisper or two with a friend, and then they cock their caps, and out they strut again." With fair and witty strangers these gay fellows, their eyebrows and perriwigs redolent of the essence of orange and jasmine, entered into conversation, till a gentleman's name, called by a door-keeper in the passage, summoned him to impatient companions, waiting for him outside; when he left the "censure" of his appearance to critical observers, like those who ridiculed the man of mode, for "his gloves drawn up to his elbows and his perriwig more exactly curled than a lady's head newly dressed for a ball."

Of the vizard-masks, Cibber tells the whole history, in a few words: "I remember the ladies were then observed to be decently afraid of venturing bare-faced to a new comedy, till they had been assured they might do it without insult to their modesty; or, if their curiosity were too strong for their patience, they took care at least to save appearances, and rarely came in the first days of acting but in masks, which custom, however, had so many ill consequences attending it, that it has been abolished these many years."

The poets sometimes accused the ladies of blushing, not because of offence, but from constraint on laughter. Farquhar's "Pindress" says to "Lucinda," "Didn't you chide me for not putting stronger laces in your stays, when you had broken one as strong as a hempen-cord with containing a violent ti-hee at a —— jest in the last play?"

Cibber describes the beaux of the seventeenth century as being of quite a different stamp from the modern sort. The former "had more of the stateliness of the peacock in their mien, whereas the latter seemed to place their highest emulation in imitating "the pert air of a lapwing." The greatest possible compliment was paid to Cibber by the handsome, witty, blooming young fop, Brett, who was so enchanted with the wig the former wore as "Sir Novelty Fashion," in Love's Last Shift, that fancying the wearing it might insure him success among the ladies, he went around to Cibber's dressing-room, and entered into negotiations for the purchase of that wonderful cataract perriwig. The fine gentlemen among the audience had, indeed, the credit of being less able to judge of a play than of a peruke; and Dryden speaks of an individual as being "as invincibly ignorant as a town-fop judging of a new play."

Lord Foppington, in 1697, did not pretend to be a beau; but he remarks, "a man must endeavor to look wholesome, lest he make so nauseous a figure in the side-box, the ladies should be compelled to turn their eyes upon the play." It was the "thing" to look upon the company, unless some irresistible attraction drew attention to the stage; and the curtain down, the beau became active in the service of the ladies generally. "Till nine o'clock," says Lord Foppington, "I amuse myself by looking on the company, and usually dispose of one hour more in leading them out."

Some fine gentlemen were unequal to such gallantry. At these Southerne glances in his Sir Anthony Love, where he describes the hard drinkers who "go to a tavern to swallow a drunkenness, and then to a play, to talk over their liquor." And these had their counterparts in

> "the youngsters of a noisy pit,
> Whose tongues and mistresses outran their wit."

It was, however, much the same in the boxes, where the beaux' oath was "zauns," it being a token of a rustic blasphemer to say "zounds;" and where, though a country squire might say, "bless us!" it was the mark of a man of fashion to cry, "dem me!"

With such personages in pit and boxes, we may rest satisfied that there was a public to match in the gallery—a peculiar as well as a general public.

A line in a prologue of the year 1672, "The stinking footman's sent to keep your places," alludes to a custom by which the livery profited. Towards the close of the century, the upper gallery of Drury Lane was opened to footmen, gratis. They were supposed to be in attendance on their masters, but these rather patronized the other house, and as Drury could not attract the nobility, it courted the favor of their not very humble servants. Previously, the lacqueys were admitted after the close of the fourth act of the play. They became the most clamorous critics in the house. It was the custom, when these fellows passed the money-taker, to name their master, who was supposed to be in the boxes; but many frauds were practiced. A stalwart, gold-laced, thick-calved, irreverent lacquey swaggered past money and check-taker, one afternoon, and named "the Lord ——," adding the name which the Jews of old would never utter, out of fear and reverence. "The Lord ——!" said the money-taker to his colleague, after the saucy footman had flung by. "who is he?" "Can't say," was the reply; "some poor Scotch lord, I suppose!" Such is an alleged sample of the ignorance and the blasphemy of the period.—Doran's Annals of the English Stage.

A DANGEROUS PLAYTHING.—A writer in an English magazine says: "Shall I tell you a truth concerning the amusements of small children in our parish, rather too small to run about the streets alone, and who are too young to attend school unless a bigger child can accompany them to the infants' school, and sit by them while there (for we occasionally take a baby child in with its elder brother or sister, who are scholars!) These little creatures never know what it is to possess a legitimate plaything. A broken shovel or knife, and lid of a tin saucepan, are their ordinary toys. A few months ago I went into a remarkably dirty house, and in one of the rooms, tenanted by a slovenly woman and four children, I saw on a large bedstead a child, eighteen months old; his features were so begrimed with black dirt, that he looked quite a little ruffian, and hardly human, as his thick, long hair hung matted over his forehead and about his cheeks. In his left hand he held upright, like a sword or sceptre, a long rusty, but unbroken carving-knife! I asked his mother if he would not hurt himself with such a dangerous plaything. 'No, mum,' she replied: 'I don't think he'll hurt hisself. He's routed that ont o' the dust 'ole this mornin', and he's been very busy with it ever since—ain't you, dear?' I left him motionless on the bed, staring after me like a little wild animal, with his carving-knife still erect. The mother did not take it away, and I dare say, if it has not yet run into him (while his mother is busy and he himself is fractions and requires diversion,) he still continues to sit upon the bed with his carving-knife!

PHOTOGRAPHIC DEFECTS.—As regards the merits of photography itself versus the pencil, it cannot be gainsaid that, although the sun is a better draughtsman than any human hand, yet there are certain drawbacks connected with it which are of moment. And, first of all, it rarely reproduces the best expression of the highest kind of beauty; in this respect it is certainly inferior to the old miniature. The reason is this. The highest kind of beauty consists in expression—it is the play of features which charms, not the mere beauty of the human mask, unimpassioned by the soul beneath. And this expression is just the thing that photography misses. When a man or woman, and especially when a woman sits to the sun for her portrait, the first thing she does is to make up a face—she can't help it, my good reader—let the muscles of your mouth play naturally, whilst your friend is daring you to do so, if you can. The consequence is, that the likeness taken of you has either an affected simper, as unlike a natural smile as German silver is like the real argent; or, it is a set and rigid effigy cast in iron. The old portrait-painter proceeded about his business leisurely—no pistolgrams for him. If the sitter should have happened to have made up a face, it relaxed before the artist's colors were mixed; but the grim camera staring you in the face, and the operator demanding that you "stop as you are," to say nothing of having your head placed in a vice, put to flight the rippling lines about the mouth, and set the eyes into a stony stare. By making a great many photographs of the same person, the unnatural rigidity of the features, it is true, relaxes; but we fear that the plain photograph never will reproduce a charming face, in which the chief beauty lies in expression. When the beauty, however, depends upon form merely, the photograph is perfect; hence classical faces should seek the sun as the most effective artist.

A FRENCH STORY.—"Spiridon," in his last letter from Paris to the Boston Gazette, writes: "Although the Grand Hotel has been open only a few months, it has seen the suicide of one of the most beautiful lorettes of Paris, a girl of scarce five-and-twenty. She loved, and her love was not returned. She lived in the Grand Hotel (many lorettes do live there.) She sent a message to the loved one that she would wait for him until one o'clock, A. M., and that if he came not then she would be a corpse. The mantel-clock struck the hour; he was not there to hear it; Mlle. de Hare took a bit of paper, lighted it at the gas jet, and applied it to her princely lace dress. In an instant she was a mass of flames. She lingered a few days and died in great agony."

ROBERT OF LINCOLN.

MERRILY swinging on briar and weed,
Near to the nest of his little dame,
Over the mountain-side or mead,
Robert of Lincoln is telling his name:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Snug and safe is that nest of ours,
Hidden among the summer flowers.
Chee, chee, chee.

Robert of Lincoln is gaily drest,
Wearing a bright black wedding coat;
White are his shoulders and white his crest,
Hear him call in his merry note:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Look, what a nice new coat is mine,
Sure there was never a bird so fine.
Chee, chee, chee.

Robert of Lincoln's Quaker wife,
Pretty and quiet, with plain brown wings,
Passing at home a patient life,
Broods in the grass while her husband sings:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Brood, kind creature; you need not fear
Thieves and robbers while I am here.
Chee, chee, chee.

Modest and shy as a nun is she;
One weak chirp is her only note.
Braggart and prince of braggarts is he,
Pouring boasts from his little throat:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Never was I afraid of man;
Catch me, cowardly knaves, if you can.
Chee, chee, chee.

Six white eggs on a bed of hay,
Flecked with purple, a pretty sight!
There as the mother sits all day,
Robert is singing with all his might:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink,
Nice, good wife, that never goes out,
Keeping house while I frolic about.
Chee, chee, chee.

Soon as the little ones chip the shell
Six wide mouths are open for food;
Robert of Lincoln bestirs him well,
Gathering seeds for the hungry brood.
Bob-o-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
This new life is likely to be
Hard for a gay young fellow like me.
Chee, chee, chee.

Robert of Lincoln at length is made
Sober with work, and silent with care;
Off is his holiday garment laid,
Half forgotten that merry air,
Bob-o'-link, bob-o' link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Nobody knows but my mate and I
Where our nest and our nestlings lie.
Chee, chee, chee.

Summer wanes; the children are grown;
Fun and frolic no more he knows;
Robert of Lincoln 's a humdrum crone;
Off he flies, and we sing as he goes:
Bob o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
When you can pipe that merry old strain,
Robert of Lincoln, come back again.

TWO LITERARY MEN OF THE "HUB."

THE Boston correspondent of the New York Home Journal says: Whenever I wish to have a peep at the great men of this locality I aim for the classic corner, where, over the door of an antiquated and sombre structure, I see the sign of "Ticknor & Fields, publishers." This is, in truth, as you well know, the very centre of "the hub" itself. Here, in fact, they "most do congregate." Often do I see the transcendental Emerson pass in and out of the old book store. Who would recognize him as one of Plato's greatest and fondest disciples? Neither in face nor figure do I interpret the philosopher. His countenance is almost farmer-like, his manner grave, and his ponderous mind exhibits not a sign of its labor. His coat is a heavy one if the weather demands it, and his head is shadowed by a black silk hat. As a stranger, my guess would be—or, more likely, I would not guess at all—that he was compounded of an agriculturist and a——fill up the blank, for I cannot complete the integer. Adamantine, I believe him to be. Visit his home in Concord. It is unpretending, and there is no sign whereby you could presume who dwelt within. Hardly a "tiller of the soil," you would determine, or he never would permit that patch of thick-set pines to exclude his house from the road. About the grounds everything wears an aspect of thrift and husbandry. Tin pans and kettles glisten in the sun, fresh from the housemaid's hands. The cord wood lies piled up along the stone wall. The house appears still and lonely, as if master and men were away in the fields, busy at work. This is at early noon, midsummer, remember, or the likeness will not stand good. Though Emerson shows no sign of his "calling," he pursues an active one. He is a fortune-teller—for nations. He manufactures souls, as nature does men—by enlargement. His life is a theory—his thoughts, aphorisms. Stand by him and measure your brain with his. You would feel a startling sense of vacancy, as if lost on the wide ocean, without sight of promontory or the faint outline of land to assure you of terra-firma and safe footing. Mingle your mind with his, and it is as a drop in the sea. Let us walk on, and leave the philosopher to munch his dry food.

Not far ahead, a yellow-colored mansion may or may not strike your heeding attention. Abruptly it approaches the road. Nothing of isolation about it. It is two stories in height, with a narrow garden in front. A high fence of slate guards it from intrusion. In the rear of the house there is neither field nor meadow. A steep hill, rising above the chimney top, conceals from your vision whatever lies beyond. Whose home is this? you ask. The dreamy, mystic Hawthorne's, who has just passed to a happier sphere. Let me tell of a habit of his, (gleaned from a native,) which, I think, is not generally known. Crowning the roof of what was once his dwelling is a cupola, small and square. This is what Hawthorne loved to call his "sky parlor." When the "fit was on him," when his mind teemed with fancies, he invariably sought this curious cloister, closed the trap-door by which it was entered,) and, placing his table and chair over it, secured himself from intrusion until he chose to meet it. Though living many years in Concord, Hawthorne was entirely foreign to it. Only a few select souls were admitted to his society. You might ask of many an old inhabitant, a prying one, too, and he could tell you naught of him. Such was his spirit of retirement and privacy, that never deserted him. I have felt, as I have striven to solve these fantastic riddles of life, how delicious must be this solitude of genius, reflecting and inventing. What treasures of fancy, beautiful in imagery, rare in flavor, perfection in form, a volume in meaning, must escape, which pen never caught, ink never stained, paper never held. In a moment's inspiration they were feathered, took wings, and disappeared forever. How precious must be these reveries! Genius communing with itself! Think of it! Fabrics built and tumbled down. Ideas of crystal purity, gambolling like Cupids, flashing like meteors, melting into thin nothingness. What a delightful career is this imaginative existence! Though the mind, perhaps, is subject to every gust of passion, and becomes overshadowed and depressed by drear melancholy.

EXTRAORDINARY INSTANCES OF MEMORY.

SENECA says of himself, that by the mere efforts of his natural memory he was able to repeat two thousand words upon once hearing them, each in its order, though they had no dependence or connection upon each other; after which he mentioned a friend of his, Pontius Latro, who retained in his memory all the orations he had ever spoken, and never found his memory fail him, even in a single word. He also mentions Cyneas, ambassador to the Romans from King Pyrrhus, who in one day so well learned the names of his inspectors, that the next day he saluted the whole senate, and all the populace assembled, each by his name. Pliny says that Cyrus knew every soldier in his army by name; and L. Scipio all the people of Rome. Herr von Nieublin, the celebrated German scholar, was once a clerk in the bank of Copenhagen, in which capacity he gave proof of the miraculous power of memory by restoring, from recollection alone, the whole contents of a leaf in the bank ledger which had been lost by fraud or accident. To these we can add instances as extraordinary as any of those cited above. Some years since, the late Daniel Webster, during a great monetary crisis, was invited by the merchants of New York to address them from the steps of the Exchange, Wall street. The afternoon on which he spoke was what is called "drizzly"—wet enough to be uncomfortable without the shelter of an umbrella. It happened that we took up a position beside him. H. Atree, the then reporter of the Herald, stood on the north side of the street, and at least sixty feet from where Mr. Webster was, with a large crowd intervening.

The oration of Mr. Webster occupied full two hours, and was replete with quotations and figures. Atree listened attentively to what was said, but was so circumstanced that it was impossible for him to take a single note of the argument. At the close of the address, he immediately returned to the office of the Herald and wrote it out, depending entirely on his memory for the entire speech. So exact was he in every particular that when the speech was published Mr. Webster felt himself constrained to write a note to the proprietor of the Herald, thanking him for the exactness with which his remarks were reported. We could name other remarkable instances of retentiveness on the part of this Atree, but we think the above instance will suffice. Mrs. Hemans, the poetess, was also endowed with a remarkable memory. It is stated in one of the biographies attached to her works, that on one occasion, to please her brother, she read a poem which had just been published, and which she had not seen until he placed it in her hands, entitled "Europe," and which were upward of two thousand lines. The reading occupied some three hours. Without preparation, and at his request she immediately repeated to him, in the presence of the author, who was unknown to her, until a subsequent introduction made her aware of the fact, the entire poem without committing a single verbal error. Sir Jonah Barrington, in his amusing "Sketches of 1798," mentions an extraordinary instance of memory. Briefly, it is as follows: The great question of the union of the English and Irish Parliaments, (which was finally consummated on the 1st of May, 1800,) was under debate. A member who represented one of the southern counties of Ireland had prepared a written speech, cogent in argument, on the negative side of the question, and which he was to have delivered on that night. Very carelessly, however, he placed it on the table in the sleeping-room of the hotel at which he stopped, and went out to fulfil an engagement. During his absence, another member from a northern county, who was strongly in favor of the union, happened to pass the room door in which was the speech. He entered it, and supposing that the southern gentleman would presently return, sat down, with the intention of having a chat with him on his return. He waited half or three quarters of an hour, but the opponent of the union not appearing, he carelessly picked up the exposed manuscript, glanced over the introductory pages, and presently became deeply absorbed in its arguments. When he had concluded the last sentence on the last page, he placed the written speech precisely as he had found it on the table, and left the room, carefully closing the door behind him. At night, when the assembled wisdom of Ireland had convened, the member from the North early sought to catch the eye of the Speaker, and opening his remarks with words to the effect that he had no doubt the strongest arguments the opposition side of the House could present in opposition to the desire of the Ministry, would be nearly of the following character, and the speaker then deliberately repeated verbatim the words of the speech which he had read during the afternoon—a speech of some hours' duration. When he had concluded what he had good reason to believe would be the remarks of the leader of the opposition, he added a few words of his own by way of combating them, and sat down in triumph. It may readily be imagined "the fix" the member who was summoned to speak in opposition to the Union was in! Sir Jonah hints that the theft had much to do with sealing the fate of Ireland—of making her a mere province of England for all future time.

A PEN-PICTURE OF GEN. SHERMAN.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette thus describes the appearance of Maj.-Gen. Sherman, as he appeared on the march around Atlanta, when he flanked Hood out of that city: "While I was watching to-day the endless line of troops shifting by, an officer with a modest escort rode up to the fence near which I was standing, and dismounted. He was rather tall and slender, and his quick movements denoted good muscle added to absolute leanness—not thinness. His uniform was neither new nor old, but bordering on a hazy mellowness of gloss, while the elbows and knees were a little accented from the continuous agitation of those joints. The face was one I should never rest upon in a crowd, simply because, to my eye, there was nothing remarkable in it, save the nose, which organ was high, thin and planted with a curve as vehement as the curl of a Malay cutlass. The face and neck were rough and covered with a reddish hair, the eye light in color and animated, but, though restless and bounding like a ball from one object to another, neither piercing nor brilliant; the mouth well closed, but common; the ears large, the hands and feet long and thin, the gait a little rolling, but firm and active. In dress and manner there was not the slightest pretension. He spoke rapidly, and generally with an inquisitive smile. To this portrait I must add a hat which was the reverse of dignified or distinguished—a simple felt affair, with a round crown and drooping rim, and you have as fair a description of Gen. Sherman's externals as I can pen.

DESICCATION OF DEAD BODIES.—At the last sitting of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Turin, a highly interesting paper was read on the subject of an embalming process invented by Professor Gorini, who had submitted various dead bodies to the examination of a commission appointed by the Academy for that purpose. Professor Gorini's object was to show:—1. That by this method dead bodies may be preserved for the space of about six months in a state of softness and freshness sufficient to fit them for dissection after the lapse of such a period; so that if a dead body, so preserved, be taken for a subject of study, say three months after death, the dissection may be continued for a couple of months longer, without the operators experiencing the slightest inconvenience from cadaveric exhalations, and, what is still more important, without his having any infection to fear in case of his cutting himself inadvertently during dissection, an accident which has caused the death of many an able practitioner. 2. That at the expiration of six months the same dead bodies begin to be mummified, and after a couple of months longer become completely desiccated and hardened, and may continue in that state for an indefinite number of years, until the operator chooses to dissect them; in which case he has only to put them into water for about a fortnight, when they will re-assume the turgid appearance and softness of dead bodies of recent date, and will be found fit for dissection. 3. That Professor Gorini is able to harden dead bodies with such little alteration in their appearance as to enable persons to identify them.

THE TOWER OF BABEL.—A writer in a recent issue of Blackwood's Magazine thus describes the Tower of Babel as it appears to travellers at the present day: "After a ride of nine miles we were at the foot of the Biers-Nimrood. Our horse's feet were trampling upon the remains of bricks, which showed here and there through the accumulated dust and rubbish of ages. Before our eyes uprose a great mound of earth, barren and bare. This was Biers-Nimrood, the ruins of the Tower of Babel, by which the first builders of the earth had vainly hoped to scale high heaven. Here, also, it was that Nebachadnezzar built, for bricks bearing his name have been found in the ruins. At the top of the mounds a great mass of brick work pierces the accumulated soil. With your finger you touch the very bricks, large, square-shaped and massive, that were "thoroughly" burned; the very mortar—the "slime," now hard as granite—handled more than four thousand years ago by earth's impious people. From the summit of the mound, far away o'er the plain, we could see glistening, brilliant as a star, the gilded dome of a mosque, that caught and reflected the bright rays of the morning sun. This glittering speck was the tomb of the holy Ali. To pray before this at some period of his life, to kiss the sacred dust of the earth around there, at some time or other, to bend his body and count his beads, is the daily desire of every devout Mohammedan.

A HEAVY JOKE ON A REBEL NEWSPAPER.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, in giving a description of Gen. Rousseau's great raid, details the following: "On the 13th ult., the raiders arrived at Ashville, having had the pleasure of skirmishing most of the way. The Ashville Vidette, a rebel sheet of no mean circulation in Alabama, was just ready to go to press. The boys in blue took possession of the office, made the rebel devils unlock the forms, when the editorial column was abstracted and a new one inserted in its stead. The first editorial, as prepared by the Yankees, announced 'the arrival of distinguished gentlemen, Maj.-Gen. Rousseau and staff,' but it added that it 'was very uncertain how long they would stay.' The second editorial was a most withering satire on Jeff Davis and his Cabinet, denouncing them all as repudiators, scoundrels, devils and malefactors, the offscouring of goths and vandals. Then followed a brief summary of recent Union victories. Persuaded by force of arms, the rebel printers sullenly made up the forms again, and then worked off the paper as usual. As the Yankee editorials were placed under the rebel editor's name, it is thought he will be arrested for publishing 'treasonable matter' before he can possibly make an explanation, for his paper was circulated and his office demolished!"

SHODDY AIRS.—A lady, more favored with fortune than education, at a soiree which she lately gave, desired her daughter to play "the fashionable new malady she got from London last week." The pretty girl obeyed, and it was very catching.

NOTICE

The publication of "The Californian" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1864.

THE NEWS.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S re-election being a fait accompli, the Richmond papers are willing to believe he is no fool, and have made up their minds that the war will continue until they triumph or become annihilated. In this critical condition the necessity of making the slaves fight is again urged, and there is a disposition to adopt the medical apothegm Similia similibus curantur. The reports in regard to Sherman are confirmed. He is marching Eastward with a carefully appointed army, whose numbers are sufficient to hurl back any force that may be brought against him, even in the heart of the enemy's country. Report says that Union sympathizers in Georgia invited his advance on Charleston and Savannah as a movement toward reconstruction. Milne with the 25,000 (?) Union prisoners which the telegrams place there, is not far out of his way. "Cavalry Sheridan" is trying to bring out the coy and bashful Early, who avoids him. From Grant, but little is heard; he may be waiting the results of co-operative movements while he holds Lee at bay. A slight but unimportant check to the tide of our success is reported to have occurred at Decatur, where 8,000 troops were captured by the rebels. Lincoln's majority is ascertained to be about 350,000, with 213 Electoral votes. Rumor points to a proclamation of amnesty about to be issued by the President, which, if done, will as effectually silence the whining of Copperhead peace men, as it will prove the magnanimity and strength of the Administration. Gold is affected per saltem, and after reaching 246—its highest point—on the 14th, dropped on the 17th inst. to 220.

CALIFORNIA ART TOPICS.

THE creation of a California Art Union, such as was organized last week, is justified not only by the liberal progress of civilization on this coast, but by the peculiar and remarkable facilities which our scenery offers to the artist. Whether California is destined to hereafter breed a race of painters beneath the shadows of Mount Shasta or the cliffs of Yosemite, is not a question of present discussion; it is enough that she offers a natural gallery of design, perhaps unequalled in the world, that will offer a perpetual study, and perhaps found a future School of Art for the painters of all centuries and ages. It is not long ago since Bierstadt, fresh from the study of the Rocky Mountains, caught new inspiration from California; and other artists, equally famed, are now projecting professional tours to this picturesque locality. The design of the new Art Union is not dissimilar to those of our Eastern cities; its primal object is to foster native talent, and form an organized nucleus around which artists, amateurs and connoisseurs shall gather. It will offer a systematized channel for the sporadic and irregular efforts of genius by opening a gallery for the exhibition of all works of native art that shall receive the endorsement of an examining committee. It will assist unostentatious and modest talent by giving it a publicity that shall be a recognized endorsement of its merits. By promoting the sale of pictures it will enable deserving artists to realize some material benefit from their profession, which, in a new community, is apt often to be inadequately paid. The public, to whose benefit the objects of this organization must ultimately tend, will in the meantime, enjoy the luxury of a fine gallery that shall be accessible at all times at a comparatively small cost, which none will grudge who have ever before realized the advantages of the Art Unions of our Eastern cities, that have become as much of a necessity as a public library. The enterprise has been inagurated under the most favorable auspices; the Board of Directors are composed of men whose names will be recognized as an earnest of the success and permanancy of the Union, and the announcement of the organization has elicited not only the good wishes, but offers of co-operation from all classes of the community. The following is the list of officers: President, Gov. Fredk. F. Low; Treasurer, William C. Ralston; Secretary, Lewis F. Ireland; Executive Committee: Robert C. Rogers, William Norris, R. J. Vandewater, George H. Howard, Charles Wolcott Brooks; Examining Committee: V. J. Fourgeaud, M. D., Morton Cheesman, Virgil Williams, S. W. Shaw, William Hooper. The organization is thoroughly completed, and rooms have been already selected for the exhibition of paintings.

THE private gallery of R. B. Woodward, at the Mission, which was publicly opened for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission on Thursday last, afforded an excellent opportunity for the public to indulge their æsthetic and charitable impulses at the same moment. The gallery itself, in design and finish, is no inconsiderable feature of the exhibition. On entering, the visitor is apt to linger in an ante-chamber profusely decorated in the Pompeiian style, with rich frescoes so chronologically correct that one might fancy himself in an apartment of the freshly exhumed house of Diomedes. The very candelebra which lights the apartment is of a like antique pattern. On the threshold, in Roman letters, appears the usual inscription, "Salve!" which some iugenious linguist, in graceful compliment to the proprietor, has rendered in the vernacular as "What Cheer." Two Grecian chairs, remarkably beautiful—and designed by Virgil Williams, the artist under whose personal supervision the gallery and antechamber were constructed—adorn the apartment. The gallery is an elliptical room, with ingeniously contrived openings from above, that by night throw a flood of gas-light, or by day mellow the sunlight that falls upon the middle-tinted walls where hang the pictures. They are sixty-six in number, comprising a small Roman study by Bierstadt, one by Schweinfurt, a number of Italian copies, and a dozen or more excellent landscapes, by Virgil Williams, of Californian and Italian scenery. One of the largest pictures in the collection—The Claudian Aqueduct—is by this artist, and though more ambitious in style and design, and perhaps more generally admired by the critics, we turn for a better expression of his genius to a smaller sketch of a Roman courtyard, with a crystalline atmosphere, and a sunshine so pure and chaste, that it illumines without warming or coloring the objects on which it falls. The sharply-defined outlines of the figures and angles of the farm-house roof, give a fair idea of that pellucid atmosphere, which, as a Californian as well as an Italian characteristic, will be readily recognized.

A very charming contrast to this view is another by the same artist of Aqua Acetosa, with the "ragged rims of thunder brooding low," and a "full-fed river" winding through the far-stretching campagna.

The statuary is at present confined to a very graceful statuette by Ives of Rebecca at the Well, to Galt's bust of a young girl, executed according to the usual Greek formula of accurate back hair and classical outline; and the life-size bust of Powers' California. Like all of this celebrated sculptor's works, it is chiefly prized for its correctness and beauty of detail, rather than any poetic conception, and expresses no further idea of California than her wonderful resemblance to a beautiful woman. Small busts of Michael Angelo and Raphael are over the doors, and on either side, niches containing statucttes of Petrarch, Dante, Ariosto and Tasso.

A LARGE landscape, just finished, the joint composition of Messrs. Williams and Hill, may be seen at the studio of the former artist for a few days before its removal to the position it is to ultimately occupy in the parlor of the Cosmopolitan. Its subject and treatment are such as will give the stranger and traveller an idea of California scenery in an aspect more charming and suggestive than we have yet seen displayed on California canvasses. This has been done without any sacrifice of truth on the part of the artists. They have merely departed from the usual attempt to display those sublimities of our characteristic scenery, which are very apt to embody a good deal that is unlovely and harsh, and which too often preponderates in "grand" pictures. The tone of the composition is quiet, even pastoral, and contrasts with the heroic style of landscape as the "Bucolics" contrasts with the "Æneid." The view is taken at sunset in the Russian River Valley, on the road to the Geysers, looking towards Mount St. Helens, whose peak in the distance has changed its usually clear mid-day outlines for a misty indistinctness that gives the spectator a vague and indefinite sense of its remoteness and magnitude. This effect, peculiar to the hour—and the only really poetic episode in a California day—has been seized by the artist to tone down and soften the hard outlines and silhouette exhibitions which the dry, clear atmosphere and cloudless sunshine of our summers are apt to give. In the foreground, a ford crosses a stream that curves gently by a grassy cape and headland, where a clump of trees overhang the waters with level shafts of sunlight striking through their foliage. Beyond a narrow neck of land, just crossed by a pleasure team whose leaders are stopping long enough to drink at the ford and catch the yellow sunshine on their backs and breasts, is another placid bit of water, reflecting only the faint pink tinge of the sky, and affording a picturesque contrast to the broad-bosomed river in the foreground, which glasses the overhanging foliage of the headlands in all its tints and shadows. Without being exaggerated or unnatural, there is a remarkable warmth about this picture, not visible in the foliage, which is soberer than many of our Eastern autumnal forests, nor in the dexterous effect of concentrated light, but rather in that general sunset atmosphere diffused throughout the whole landscape, which every true lover of nature must have experienced. We have seen brighter pictures with less of this wholesome glow and warmth. Messrs. Hill and Williams deserve considerable credit, not only for their artistic execution but for their bold conception of a landscape that should disregard the somewhat too familiar and overdone "heroics" of California scenery, and, without violating nature, paint a picture that might be mistaken for an Eastern landscape.

A FORTHCOMING WORK.—Mrs. R. H. Stoddard, wife of the poet, and THE CALIFORNIAN'S New York Correspondent, has a new volume in press entitled Father and Son. It is her second work, and judging from the reputation she has already achieved, we shall look for its advent on this coast with considerable expectation. Carleton is the publisher, and he will undoubtedly bring it out in good style.

SAN FRANCISCO, BY THE POETS.

NUMBER FIVE.

A LAY OF THE LAUNCH.—AFTER TENNYSON.

MY heart is wasted with my woe,
Camanche;
In vain I strove to see the show,
Camanche;
Divorced from shore—from libels free—
I came to view thy charms per se;
It was no maiden plunge to thee,
Camanche.

I did not see thee launched at all,
Camanche;
The crowd was large—the gate was small,
Camanche.
I stood without and cursed my fate,
The time, the tide that would not wait,
With others who had come too late,
Camanche.

Why did they send thee off so soon,
Camanche?
They should have waited until noon,
Camanche.
O cruel fate, that from my gaze
Hid wedges, props, and broken stays,
And made thy ways as "secret ways,"
Camanche.

I was thine own invited guest,
Camanche.
I missed the feast, with all the rest,
Camanche.
I missed the cold tongue, and the flow
Of eloquence and Veuve Cliquot;
I missed my watch and chain, also,
Camanche.

For when I strove to reach thy deck,
Camanche,
A hand was passed around my neck,
Camanche;
A false, false hand my beaver pressed
Upon mine eyes, and from my vest
Unhooked my chain—why tell the rest?
Camanche.

My coat was torn—the best I had,
Camanche.
I wished I, too, were iron-clad,
Camanche.
They tore my coat and vest of silk,
They groaned and cried, "a bilk, a bilk!"
Rude boys and others of that ilk.
Camanche.

Thy yard was full of stumbling blocks,
Camanche,
That told a sudden fall in stocks,
Camanche.
I stood where late thy keel had slid—
I did not heed as I was bid,
Hence what thy keel had done, I did,
Camanche.

It was a bitter, frightful fall,
Camanche;
I slid some thirty feet in all,
Camanche.
Some thirty feet upon my back
I slipped along the slimy track;
They cried, "Another launch—alack!"
Camanche.

My heart was wasted with my woe,
Camanche,
I thought that I would homeward go,
Camanche.
In vain I hailed a crowded car;
They answered not my signs afar;
O day, cursed by my evil star.
Camanche.

"HONOR TO WHOM HONOR."—We are obliged to record another instance of the practice to which we alluded last week. A poem entitled "Cupid Kissed Me," which appeared originally in THE CALIFORNIAN of August 13, from a lady contributor, was copied in the New York Leader, without credit, and recopied again in the Bulletin of the 17th inst. If this sort of thing is to be repeated, we would suggest to the Leader the propriety of changing its title to that of "the misleader," as more truthful and appropriate.

SANITARY FUND.—Since our last issue the contributions from the different polls and Soldiers' Aid Societies in the interior have continued to flow daily into the treasury of the Commission. Fifty-six towns have reported to the office in this city and have returned $2,668 82 in coin and $154 65 in Legal Tender Notes; four societies have contributed $214; the Camanche, including launching day, $724 55; steamer San Rafael, $218 25; sloop Dorinda, $36; unknown contributors in the interior, $228 70; this city, $997 30 in coin and $13 in Legal Tender Notes: other contributions, $98 35. Total, $5,285 97 in coin and $167 65 in Legal Tender Notes. Last steamer day the Executive Committee made another remittance to the treasury of the parent Commission in New York of a draft for $16,000, payable in gold. The total receipts from visitors to the Camanche, including the day of the launch, amount to $5,518 95.

"MY MOTHER BIDS ME BIND MY HAIR."

MY mother bids me bind my hair,
But tells me not how I shall bind,
And since it 's thin I think I'll wear
A net and waterfall behind.

And if the foolish world and blind
Shall deem it real, I'll let them weave
Their idle fancies : womankind
Ne'er spread their nets but to deceive.

A FULL AND RELIABLE ACCOUNT OF THE EXTRAORDINARY METEORIC SHOWER OF LAST SATURDAY NIGHT.

I FOUND the following paragraph in the morning papers of the 11th inst. :

VIRGINIA, November 10.—Astronomers anticipate a recurrence this year of the November meteoric shower of 1833. The mornings from the 11th to the 15th are all likely to show an unusual number of meteors, especially from the 12th to the 14th. The best time of observation is from half-past one o'clock, A. M., onward. The radiant point is the constellation Leo. Observers in California, Nevada and the Pacific Coast generally, are requested to report their observations to Professor Silliman, Jr., San Francisco, for the American Journal of Science, where they will be published for the good of science.

B. SILLIMAN, JR.

PROF. B. SILLIMAN, JR.—Dear Sir : In accordance with the above request, which you so politely extended to all "observers," I took copious notes of the amazing meteoric phenomena of last Saturday night, and I now hasten to make my report to you for publication in the American Journal of Science "for the good of science."

I began my observations early in the evening, previously providing myself with the very best apparatus I could find wherewith to facilitate my labors. I got a telescopic glass tumbler, and two costly decanters, (containing eau de vie and Veuve Cliquot to wash out the instrument with whenever it should become clouded,) and seated myself in my window, very nearly under the constellation Leo. I then poured about a gill of liquid from each decanter into the telescopic tumbler and slowly elevated it to an angle of about ninety degrees. I did not see anything. The second trial was also a failure, but I had faith in that wash, and I washed out the instrument again. And just here let me suggest to you, Professor, that you can always depend on that mixture ; rightly compounded, I expect it is the most powerful aid to human eyesight ever invented ; assisted by it I have known a man to see two drinks on the counter before him when in reality there was but one—and so strong was the deception that I have known that man to get drunk on thirteen of these duplicate drinks when he was naturally gauged for twenty-six.

Very well ; after I had washed out my glass the third time, three or four stars, of about the nineteenth magnitude I should judge, shot from the zenith and fell in the general direction of Oakland. During the fourth wash, and while I had one eye sighted on Venus and the other one closed in blissful repose, that planet fell upon the roof of the Russ House and bounced off into Bush street ; immediately afterward, Jupiter fell and knocked a watchman's eye out—at least I think it was that star, because I saw the watchman clap his hand to his eye and say "By Jupiter!" The assertion was positive, and made without hesitation, as if he had the most perfect confidence in the accuracy of his judgment ; but at the same time it is possible that he might have been mistaken, and that the damage was not done by Jupiter after all. I maintain, though, that the chances are all in favor of his being correct, because I have noticed that policemen usually know as much about stars as anybody, and take more interest in them than most people.

Up to this time the wind had been north by northeast half west, and I noticed an uncommon dryness in the atmosphere, but it was less marked after I applied the fifth wash. My barometer never having had any experience in falling stars, got hopelessly tangled in trying to get the run of things, and after waltzing frantically between "stormy" and "falling weather" for awhile without being able to make up its mind, it finally became thoroughly demoralized and threw up its commission. My thermometer did not indicate anything ; I noted this extraordinary phenomenon, of course, but at the same time I reasoned—and, I think, with considerable sagacity—that it was less owing to the singular condition of the atmosphere than to the fact that there was no quicksilver in the instrument. About this time a magnificent spectacle dazzled my vision—the whole constellation of the Great Menken came flaming out of the heavens like a vast spray of gas-jets, and shed a glory abroad over the universe as it fell! [N. B. I have used the term "Great Menken" because I regard it as a more modest expression than the Great Bear, and consequently better suited to the columns of THE CALIFORNIAN, which goes among families, you understand—but when you come to transfer my report to the Journal of Science, Professor, you are at liberty to change it if you like.]

I applied the sixth wash. A sprinkle of sparkling fragments ensued—fragments of some beautiful world that had been broken up and cast out of the blue firmament—and then a radiance as of noonday flared out of the zenith, and Mercury, the winged symbol of Progress, came sweeping down like a banished sun, and catching in the folds of the flag that floats from the tall staff in the Plaza, remained blazing in the centre of its dim constellation of stars! "Lo, a miracle! the thirty-sixth star furnished from the imperial diadem of heaven! while yet no welcome comes from the old home in the Orient, behold the STATE OF NEVADA is recognized by God!" says I, and seized my telescope, filled her to the brim and washed her out again! The divinity student in the next room came in at this juncture and protested against my swearing with so much spirit, and I had some difficulty in making him understand that I had only made use of a gorgeous metaphor, and that there was really no profanity intended in it.

About this time the wind changed and quite a shower of stars fell, lasting about twenty minutes ; a lull ensued, and then came several terrific discharges of thunder and lightning, and how it poured! you couldn't see the other side of the street for the hurtling tempest of stars! I got my umbrella —which I had previously provided along with my other apparatus—and started down the street. Of course there was plenty of light, although the street lamps were not lit—(you let that sagacious gas company alone, Professor, to make a good thing out of it when the almanac advertises anything of this kind. I put in these parentheses to signify a complicated wink—you understand?) I met Charles Kean, and I expect he was drunk ; I drifted down the pavement, tacking from one side of it to the other, and trying to give him a wide berth, but it was no use ; he would run into me, and he did—he brought up square against me and fell. "Down goes another star," I observed, and stopped a moment to make a note of it.

The meteoric storm abated gradually, and finally ceased, but by that time the stars had cut my umbrella nearly all to pieces, and there were a dozen or more sticking in it when I lowered it. It was the most furious deluge I ever saw, while it lasted. Pretty soon I heard a great huzzaing in the distance, and immediately afterward I noticed a brilliant meteor streaming athwart the heavens with a train of fire of incredible length appended to it. It swept the sky in a graceful curve, and after I had watched its splendid career a few seconds and was in the act of making the proper entry in my note-book, it descended and struck me such a stunning thump in the pit of the stomach that I was grovcling in the dust before I rightly knew what the matter was. When I recovered consciousness, I remarked "Down went a couple of us then," and made a note of it. I saved the remains of this most remarkable meteor, and I transmit them to you with this report, to be preserved in the National Astronomical Museum. They consist of a fragment of a torn and jagged cylinder the size of your wrist, composed of a substance strongly resembling the pasteboard of this world ; to this is attached a slender stick some six feet long, which has something of the appearance of the pine wood so well known to the commerce of this earth, but of such a supernatural fineness of texture, of course, as to enable one to detect its celestial origin at once. There is food here for philosophic contemplation, and a series of interesting volumes might be written upon a question which I conceive to be of the utmost importance to Science, viz. : Do they cultivate pines in Paradise? And if it be satisfactorily demonstrated that they do cultivate pines in Paradise, may we not reasonably surmise that they cultivate cabbages there also? O, sublime thought! O, beautiful dream! The scientific world may well stand speechless and awe-stricken in the presence of these tremendous questions! But may we not hope that the learned German who has devoted half his valuable life to determining what materials a butterfly's wing is made of, and to writing unstinted books upon the subject, will devote the balance of it to profound investigation of the celestial cabbage question? And is it too much to hope that that other benefactor of our race who has proven in his thirteen inspired volumes that it is exceedingly mixed as to whether the extraordinary bird called the Phœnix ever really existed or not, will lend his assistance to the important work and turn out a few tomes upon the subject, wherewith to enrich our scientific literature? My dear sir, this matter is worthy of the noblest effort ; for we know by the past experience of learned men, that whosoever shall either definitely settle this cabbage question, or indefinitely unsettle it with arguments and reasonings and deductions freighted with that odor of stately and incomprehensible wisdom which is so overpowering to the aspiring student and so dazzling and bewildering to the world at large, will be clothed with titles of dignity by our colleges, and receive medals of gold from the Kings and Presidents of the earth.

As I was meandering down the street, pondering over the matters treated of in the preceding paragraph, I ran against another man, and he squared off for a fight. I squared off, also, and dashed out with my left, but he dodged and "cross-countered." [I have since learned that he was educated at the Olympic Club.] That is to say, he ducked his head to one side and avoided my blow, and at the same time he let go with his right and caved the side of my head in. At this moment I beheld the most magnificent discharge of stars that had occurred during the whole evening. I estimated the number to be in the neighborhood of fifteen hundred thousand. I beg that you will state it at that figure in the Journal of Science, Professor, and throw in a compliment about my wasting no opportunity that seemed to promise anything for the good of the cause. It might help me along with your kind of men if I should conclude to tackle science for a regular business, you know. You see they have elected a new Governor over there in Nevada, and consequently I am not as much Governor of the Third House there as I was. It was a very comfortable berth ; I had a salary of $60,000 a year when I could collect it.

While my stranger and myself were staggering under the two terrific blows which we had exchanged—and especially myself, on account of the peculiar nature of the "cross-counter" as above described—a singular star dropped in our midst which I would have liked well to possess, because of its quaint appearance, and because I had never seen anything like it mentioned in Mr. Dick's astronomy. It emitted a mild silvery lustre, and bore upon its face some characters which, in the fervor of my astronomical enthusiasm, I imagined spelt "Police—18," but of course this was an absurd delusion. I only mention it to show to what lengths scientific zeal will sometimes carry a novice. This marvellous meteor was already in the possession of another enthusiast, and he would not part with it.

On my way home, I met young John William Skae—the inimitable punster of Virginia City, and formerly of Pennsylvania, perhaps you know him?—and I knew from his distraught and pensive air that he was building a joke. I was anxious not to intrude any excitement upon him, which might have the effect of bringing the half-finished edifice down about my ears, but my very caution precipitated the catastrophe I was trying to avert. Said I, "Are you out looking for meteors, too?" His eye instantly lighted with a devilish satisfaction, and says he : "Well, sorter ; I'm looking for my Susan—going to meteor by moonlight alone ; O Heavens! why this sudden pang, this bursting brain! save me, save me or I perish!"

But I didn't save him—I let him drop ; and I deserted him and left him moaning there in the gutter. A man cannot serve me that way twice and expect me to stand by him and chafe his temples and blow his nose and sand-paper his legs and fetch him round again. I would let him perish like an outcast first, and deny him Christian burial afterwards. That Skae has always been following me around trying to make me low-spirited with his dismal jokes, but since that time he caught me out in the lonely moor on the Cliff House road, and intimidated me into listening to that execrable pun on the Kingfisher, I have avoided him as I would a pestilence.

I will now close my report, Professor. If you had not just happened to print that assurance in your little notice that these things should be published in the American Journal of Science, "for the good of Science," I expect it never would have occurred to me to make any meteorological observations at all ; but you see that remark corralled me. It has been the dearest wish of my life to do something for the good of Science and see it in print in such a paper as the one you mention, and when I saw this excellent opportunity presented, I thought it was now or never with me. It is a pity that the astonishing drawings which accompany this report cannot be published in the CALIFORNIAN ; it could not be helped, though : the artist who was to have engraved them was not healthy, and he only took one look at them and then went out in the back yard and destroyed himself. But you can print them in the Journal of Science, anyhow, just the same ; get an artist whose sensibilities have been toned down by chiseling melancholy devices on tombstones all his life, and let him do them up for you. He would probably survive the job.

MARK TWAIN.

TWO FRENCH ANECDOTES.—"Spiridion," in his letter to the Boston Saturday Gazette, says : Since I am in the vein of anecdote-telling you must be patient while I hold you by the button, for I have one or two more to tell you. One of them was told me in connection with the festival given at Versailles to the King of Spain. A performance by the actors of the French comedy was about to be given in the beautiful theatre. During the morning of the day whose evening was to witness the performance, a rehearsal took place in the theatre of the palace. While Mlle. Augustine Brohan was rehearsing her part she discovered enconsed in one of the ground tier of boxes a man. You know how dark theatres are in mid-day. She bawled at him in her sharp, insolent way (she has the most insolent voice I ever heard) : "I say, you! there! What in the deuce d'ye mean by putting your nose in here? Are you one of the actors?" She thought he was some servant of the palace who had slipped in to enjoy the performance. There was no reply. "I say, you, there! Didn't you hear me? Yes, I mean you! Are you deaf, eh?" "No, Mlle. Brohan. I should lose too much when you are playing were I so unfortunate," replied a courteous voice whose possessor at the same time leaned his head out of the box, bowed and smiled benignantly. Judge Mlle. Brohan's confusion when she discovered King Louis Philippe in the speaker! The next day, one of the king's aides-de-camp carried her a magnificent gold eye-glass set in diamonds, as much as to say : "Use better eyes next time."

This anecdote led to another about the Orleans family. The Duchess d'Orleans had heard all of her life of the Grande Chaumière, the famous student's ball-room which was at her marriage in the height of its vogue (it is now a button manufactory.) She persuaded her husband to carry her there. He consented. They slipped out of the palace of the Tuileries without letting anybody know where they were going, and they took a hack and drove to the famous ball-room. Nobody recognized them and they greatly amused themselves. As the closing hour drew near a violent storm set in. There were no hacks near that ball. The Duke had no umbrella. There was nothing to be done as the rain was falling in torrents. A student came by with an umbrella. The Duke begged him to extend the hospitality of his umbrella to his wife. The student replied : "Willingly, upon condition that I am the lady's escort," for the young man had no idea of being wet through to oblige another man. So the Duke of Orleans had to walk in the rain from the Boulevard Mont Parnasse to the Tuileries (about two miles.) When the student saw the Duke and Duchess enter the Tuileries, he suspected for the first time who his companions were. The Duke of Orleans bore him no grudge for the ducking, asked him his name and gave him his patronage. The young man was a medical student and is now none other than the celebrated Dr. Barthe.

MAGIC MIRRORS AND BURNING LENSES.

THE famous mirror which Ptolemy Evergetes caused to be placed in the Pharos at Alexandria belongs to the first class. This mirror is stated by ancient authors to have represented accurately every thing which was transacted throughout all Egypt, both on water and on land. Some writers affirm that upon its surface an enemy's fleet could be seen at the distance of 600,000 paces; others say, more than 100 leagues! Albulfeda, in his description of Egypt, states this mirror to have been of "Chinese iron," which Buffon cousiders to mean polished steel; but a writer in the Philosophical Magazine. 1805, supposes the metal to have been tutenag, a Chinese metallic compound, capable of receiving the highest polish. The existence of Ptolemy's mirror has, however, been generally treated as a fiction; but Father Abbat, in his Anusemens Philosophiques, first published at Marseilles in 1763, considers that it may have been at the time the only mirror of its kind, and, being a great wonder, its effects may have been greatly exaggerated; making allowance for which, nothing remains "but that at some distance, provided nothing was interposed between the objects and the mirror, those objects were seen more distinctly than with the naked eye; and that with the mirror many objects were seen which, because of their distance, were imperceptible without it."

It is certain that, under some circumstances, objects may be seen at a much greater distance than is generally supposed. Thus it is stated that the Isle of Man is clearly visible from the summit of Ben Lomond, in Scotland, or 120 miles distant. Byrdone states, that from the summit of Etna mountains 200 miles off may be distinguished; and, during his visit to Teneriffe in 1856, Mr. Piazzi Smyth saw objects at a much greater distance.

Burning-Mirrors have been celebrated on account of their size and extraordinary effects. One of these optical machines was the work of Stettala, a canon of Milan; it was parabolic, and, acting as a burning-glass, inflamed wood at the distance of fifteen or sixteen paces. Leonard Digges, in his Pantometria. 1571, states that "with a glasse framed by a revolution of a section parabolicall, I have set firo to powder half a milc and more distant." In the prosecution of this subject, the celebrated Napier and Sir Isaac Newton experimented with parabolic reflectors before 1673. Vilette, an artist and optician of Lyons, constructed three mirrors, about the year 1670: one of these, which was purchased by the king of France, was thirty inches in diameter, and of about three feet focus. The rays of the sun were collected by it into the space of about one inch. It immediately set fire to the greenest wood; it fused silver and copper in a few seconds; and in one minute vitrified brick and flint earth. A mirror, superior even to these, was constructed by Baron von Tchivnhausen, about 1687: it consistep of a metal plate, twice as thick as the blade of a common knife; it was five feet three inches in breadth, and its focal distance was three feet six inches. It produced the follwing effects: wood, exposed to its focus, immediately took fire; copper and silver passed into fusion in a few minutes; and slate was transformed into a kind of black glass, which, when laid hold of with a pair of pincers, could be drawn out into filaments. Pumice-stone and fragments of crucibles, which had withstood the most violent furnaces, were also vitrified.

The burning lens constructed by Mr. Parker many years since, at an expense of upwards of £7,000, was of flint-glass, 3 feet in diameter, and weighed 212 pounds; the focal length being 6 feet 8 inches, and the diameter of the focus 1 inch. To concentrate the rays still further, a second leus was used, and reduced the diameter of the focus to half an inch. Under this lens every kind of wood took fire in an instant, whether hard or green, or even soaked in water. Thin iron plates grew hot in an instant, and then melted. Tiles, slates, and all kinds of earth, were instantly vitrified. Sulphur, pitch, and all resinous bodies, melted under water. Fir-wood, exposed to the focus under water, did not seem changed; but when broken, the inside was burnt to a coal. Any metal whatever, enclosed in charcoal, melted in a moment, the fire sparkling like that of a forge. When copper was melted, and thrown down quickly into cold water, it produced so violent a shock as to break the strongest earthen vessels, and the copper was entirely dissipated. Though the heat of the focus was so intense as to melt gold in a few seconds, yet there was so little heat at a short distance from the focus, that the finger might be placed an inch from it without injury. Mr. Parker having put his finger at the focus to try the sensation, found it not to resemble that produced by fire or a lighted candle, but like that of a sharp cut with a lancet.

DE MORNY DILUTES A STINGY MAN'S WINE.—Hydraulic pressure is known to be a great power, and the Duc de Morny years ago put it to a new use, and successfully pierced the thick skin of a vulgarian. The nouveau riche in question gave dinners, and always reserved for himself and his wife a certain exquisite vintage of Leoville, which the famous house of Clossman of Bordcaux sold him for a louis a bottle. The servant who stood behind his master's chair had secret orders to manœuvre with this particular wine, so that the guests, although served with the best, never tasted the Leoville.

M. de Morny, informed of this fact, watched the servant, and watched his clever manipulation of the bottle. The man asked him—

"Hermitage?"

The count replied, pointing to the place where the bottle was secreted, loudly, "I prefer Leoville."

The man looked at his master, who, seeing that he was discovered, made the best of it.

"Don't you hear? The count prefers Leoville."

The precious bottle was brought from its hiding-place, and the count's wineglass slowly filled—the host, his wife, and all the guests observing the operation with deep interest.

M. de Morny poured the contents of the small glass into his tumbler, filled it up leisurely with water, and drank it as if it were only ordinary wine.

It must have been a dreadful moment for Monsieur and Madame, the host and hostess.

Jules Le Comte is responsible for the publication of the anecdote quoted above, and they are approved in London Society.

TWO FISH STORIES.

WE pitched our tents about five o'clock, still close to the shore; and whilst dinner was preparing over our charcoal fire, I determined to enjoy the luxury of a cold bath. Being a good swimmer I cruised out at once towards a coral reef which I observed at some little distance, and having reached it I landed upon its flat surface, which was covered where I stood by about a foot and a half of water, as bright and transparent as glass, so that I had no difficulty in discovering that there was, close to the spot I had reached, a large crack or crevice about two feet in width, and apparently of interminable depth.

Into this crevice I peered in search of natural curiosities. I had not long to wait. Two huge brown antennæ, like the feelers of a lobster, only magnified many fold, gradually projected themselves from within the crevice; and although I could not distinctly make out the body corporate to which they belonged, yet I was so convinced that I had the good luck to have found a fine lobster, which might be convertible into pleasurable sensations of a stomachic character, that I determined to seize upon him and swim back to my dinner with my fish-course in my hand.

I knelt down upon the reef, and seizing one of the feelers with a vigorous grasp, I was preparing for a game of "pull devil, pull baker," when to my horror the creature rose at me from his liar with the rapidity of a sailor climbing the ropes, and evidently prepared to do battle with as much unconcern as if I had been one of the spokes of Pharaoh's chariot wheels. To my startled brain the brute seemed to be about the size of a full grown porpoise; but of this I am certain, that I waited on the reef until I had seen fully three feet of his horrid carcass emerge from the hole, and then—shall I own it?—with a yell of alarm which must have been audible at Hebron, I plunged into the water and swam for my life!

At such moments they say strange ideas crowd the brain. I had a distinct vision of the action of an immense pair of sharp sugar-nippers, with which, as a boy, I had often assisted the housekeeper to cut up the loaves of sugar. I felt the nippers npon my person, I dived, ducked, and buffeted, not daring to look behind, but with a growing conviction that no efforts of mine could compete with those of a combative lobster, measuring three feet to the commencement of his tail. How I escaped I know not, but when I got to shore intact, after looking around to see if there had been any witnesses to my ignominious flight, I sat down and fairly laughed till I cried, at the ludicrous picture I must have presented.

The only other bathing adventure I met with in the Red Sea was the sudden and close contiguity of a seal, its bullet head bobbing up and down from the water, whilst he stared fixedly at me with his beautiful eyes, as if not quite making up his mind whether I was fair game for a nibble. However, this was pleasant pastime compared with the aggressive lobster, if lobster it was.

But after these comic adventurcs we very nearly experienced a real tragedy. The next day we again pitched our tents near the sea coast, and it occurred to my big German servant, who went by the name of the Gorrilla, that he would emulate his master's swimming feats; so after looking to his duties in our tents, the Gorrilla took to the water. He was a good swimmer, and struck out to a considerable distance from the shore.

I was strolling with R——— upon the beach as the man was returning from his cruise, when, happening to watch his movements, I distinctly observed at a short distance in his rear, that fatal and unmistakable back fin of the shark, which always obtrudes from the water when it is in pursuit, and the sight of which has so often struck terror into the boldest hearts. It was evident the man was totally unaware of his peril. I seized R——— by the wrist and pointed towards it. He understood in a moment, and both had the presence of mind not to utter a sound or to make any agitating gesture. Had the servant become suddenly alarmed his fate would have been sealed, for any rapid and agitated movement would have sharpened the appetite of the voracious monster. No earthly aid could avail. We watched the dreadful black mark following the poor fellow, now gaining upon him, now dodging him; at every moment we expected the dash and spring preceding the crimson streak of gore, after which all is over. I felt sick with apprehension. I wish my worst enemy may never experience a more terrible moment than that of witnessing an impending death of so horrid a kind, without the power of affording the slightest assistance. At length when the poor man arrived safely on shore. I embraced him with joy, to his great confusion and astonishment.

The mode of travelling in the Desert has so often been described that I need do no more than add my tribute to its charms. There is no life to be compared to it; the air you breathe is an elixir. In the Desert we learn for the first time what hunger really is, and what depths of repose its fatigues can open to us. The Arabian heaven is indeed "poured upon our nights," and although the Arabian sun during the day may be a little too hot, yet the delicious coolness of the evening atones for the previous frizzle. Everything incident, however trivial, is an excitement. A strange Arab on his swift dromedary is seen in the horizon, perhaps a spy from a hostile tribe—faint hopes of a skirmish, and a careful looking to pistols and fire-arms; a gronp of stunted shrubs indicating the presence of some "diamond of the Desert:" the comfortable encampmeut in the evening, so home-like that one leaves the very chicken bones the next morning with regret. All is delightful, strange, new and exhilarating; and I sit dowu again by my sea-coal fire with a deep feeling of thankfulness that I have experienced the delights of Eastern travel.—Sixpenny Magazine.

TIMON THE MISANTHROPE, after having renounced the society of his fellow-men, still kept up a kind of intimacy with another misanthrope named Apimantus. During a repast in which they were celebrating the second day of the Anthesteria, Apimantus, charmed with the tete-a-tete, exclaimed: "Oh, Timon! what an agreeable supper!" "Ay," replied the other, "were you only away!"

AMONG the ancient Welsh three sorts of person—a madman, a stranger and a leper—might be killed with impunity.

CURIOUS ILLUSTRATION OF RED TAPE.—About fifteen years ago it happened in a certain country of Europe that the Inspector General of Garrisons, while visiting a provincial town, observed a sentinel stationed at a little distance outside the walls, keeping gnard over some ruined buildings in the suburbs. The General inquired of the sentinel, with some curiosity, why he was posted there. The sentinel referred him to his sergeant. The sergeant had nothing to say but that such were the orders of his lieutenant. The lieutenant justified himself under the authority of the commandant of the garrison. Upon being applied to for his reasons for the standing order in question, the commandant informed the Inspector General, with much seriousness, that his predecessor in office had handed down to him the custom as one of the military duties of the place.

A search was immediately instituted in the archives of the municipality, the result of which was to obtain satisfactory proof that, for the last seventy years, a sentinel had always stood over the ruined buildings in the same manner. With awakened interest and curiosity, the General returned to the capital. He there set on foot a more elaborate investigation among the State documents of the Minister of War. After long delay it was at last discovered that the ruined building of the faubourg had been, in 1790, a storehouse for mattresses belonging to the garrison, and that in the course of that summer it became desirable to paint the door. While the paint was wet a guard was placed outside to warn those who went in and out; but before the paint was dry it came to pass that the officer on duty was dispatched on a mission of importance, and left the town without remembering to remove the sentinel. For seventy years a guard of honor has constantly remained over the door, a sacred and inviolable tradition, but one which represented at the bottom no higher idea than the idea of wet paint.

INDIAN STRATEGY.—A very curious piece of strategy which took place recently shows that the wonders of Cooper's Indian heroes have not ceased. One of the Fourteenth New York Artillery—a Seneca Indian, I believe, from the western part of the State—undertook, on a wager, to bring in alive a rebel sharpshooter, who was perched in a tree in front of our line, considerably in advance of his own. His manner of accomplishing this was as ingenious as successful, and rivals the "deviltry" of any of the Leather-stocking red-skins. Procuring a quantity of pine boughs, he enveloped himself with them from head to foot; attaching them securely to a branch, which he lashed lengthwise of his body. When completed he was indistinguishable to a casual observer from the surrounding foliage, and resembled a tree as closely as it was possible for his really artistic efforts to render him. Thus prepared, and with musket in hand, concealed likewise, he stole by almost imperceptible movements to beneath the tree where the sharpshooter was lodged. Here he patiently waited until his prey had emptied his piece at one of our men, when he suddenly brought his musket to bear upon the "reb," giving him no time to reload. The sharpshooter was taken at a disadvantage. To the command to come down he readily assented, when the Indian triumphantly marched him a prisoner into camp and won the wager.—Petersburg Army Letter.

AN amusing scene occurred recently at an Austrian theatre, in a representation of Hamlet. By a preconcerted arrangement, the actors changed their allotted places on the stage in the ghost scene, where "Hamlet" exorcises the spirit of his murdered father. When the prince concluded his harangue, and the ghost told his tale of woe, the trap-door upon which "Hamlet" was standing suddenly gave way, and the ghost was left before the foot-lights with the word "Adieu!" on his lips, while he that was supposed to be of "the earth earthy" sank from the gaze of the excited and amused audience. The mistake occurred because the machinist of the theatre was not made aware of the change in the position of the actors.

IT is more difficult to forgive an injury from a friend than from an enemy. Your favorite dog flying at you pains you more than a similar assault from a strange one.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

Sold by all Druggists, and by

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well:
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?
A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29-3m

NEW BOOKS.

THE following review of recent publications received from A. Roman & Co. is continued from last week:

Emily Chester. A Novel. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

A cleverly written novel, with an unfortunate plot and an erysipilectic development of sentiment which is becoming too common now-a-days to excite much remark. As usual, the heroine voluntarily marries a man whom she does not love, for apparently no other purpose than to love some one whom she does not marry, and finally dies a victim—if the reader pleases, a martyr—to her irregular passion. There is the usual veneering of ugly facts by new principles of philosophy—hints about a new religion where these self-immolated martyrs are to be rewarded—and a musky odor of that French sentimentalism which George Sand and her imitators have introduced is occasionally exhaled from its chapters. It is a pity, as the work indicates great promise, and is above the average of American novels:

Life of Jean Paul Frederic Richter. Compiled from Various Sources. Preceded by his Autobiography. By Eliza Buckminster Lee. Third Edition. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. San Francisco: Roman & Co.

This volume is partly compiled from Jean Paul's episodial autobiography, and the biographies hitherto published in Germany. Richter has a large circle of American readers, and the present work is calculated to meet the universal desire to know more of his personality. Unfortunately, the transcendental style of his autobiography does not always make this clear, and sometimes puzzles the translator. The appended extract is from his autobiography:

In our first childish years the father permitted, after the early supper on winter evenings, yet another joyful repast, when the housemaid brought her distaff into the common apartment, illuminated with all the light the pine-torch could afford, kindled, as in Westphalia, from a pine-branch.

At this supper-table, as I now remember it, beside confectionery and ices, and the popular tale of "Aschenbrodel," was also that pine apple artificially raised by the maid herself—namely, the history of the shepherd and his wolf-fight with wolves, with whom at one time his own danger, and at another that of his provision, was the greatest. Yet I felt the increasing happiness of the shepherd as my own, and remark only from my own experience that children in fictitious stories are far more interested in the gradual progression of happiness than in that of misfortune, and that they wish the path of heaven should lead up eternally, but the path of hell should go down only as far as is necessary to glorify and exalt the throne of heaven. These childish wishes would also later be the wishes of men, and they would for their fulfilment make stronger demands upon the poet, were only a new heaven as easy to create as a new hell. Every tyrant can invent unheard-of pains, but to discover unknown joys, they must themselves know the value of them. The seat of torture is the skin; upon which a hundred hells, from inch to inch, may pitch their tents, but the heaven of the five senses hovers, airy and uniform, above us.

At the end of the winter evening, a horrible wasp-sting or vampire's tongue threatened our hero. The children at nine o'clock were sent to bed in the guest's chamber, in the second story; my brother in a bed in the common apartment, and I in a room that I shared with my father. There, until he had finished his two hours' long night-reading, I lay with my head under the bed-clothes, in the cold agony of fear of ghosts, and saw in the darkness the lightning from the cloudy heaven of spirits; and it seemed to me as if man himself was spun round by spirit-worms. I suffered thus helplessly two long hours, until at last my father came up, and, like a morning sun, chased away the spectres, like dreams, and the next morning the ghostly torment was as completely forgotten as if it had been a dream, but only to appear again the next evening. Yet have I never mentioned this to any one until to-day I tell it to the world.

This fear of ghosts was not so much created as nourished by my father himself. He spared us not one of all the spiritual appearances of which he had heard, and even told us some which he believed himself to have experienced; but, like the old theologians, he united with a firm belief in them a firm courage against them, and Christ upon the cross was to him a shield against all spirits. Many children who are physically timid appear courageous against spirits, but this is merely from a want of imagination. On the contrary, a child like myself trembles before the invisible world, which his fancy forms and peoples, but arms himself easily against the visible, as this never reaches the depth and greatness of the invisible. Thus an eminent physical danger, such as a furious horse, a clap of thunder, war, or an alarm of fire, made me tranquil and self-possessed, as I was susceptible of fear only through the imagination, and not by the senses. A ghost, could I have survived the first shudder, would have restored me again to common life, if it did not, through gesture or sound, precipitate me into the endless kingdom of Fantasie. But how are we now to be preserved by education from the tragical overmastery of the spirit-invoking imagination? Not through contradiction, and the Wagnerish solution of the monsters in the light of day, for the possibility of the unexplained exceptions, retains firm hold of our deepest convictions; but sometimes, partly through prosaic solutions and familiarity with places and times where formerly the imagination kindled its enchanted vapor, and partly through means by which the imagination is armed against the imagination and spirits are opposed to spirits, to the Devil—God!

Our Mutual Friend. Book First. By Charles Dickens. New York: John Bradburn. San Francisco: Roman & Co.

Unsatisfactory as the perusal of a story by instalments must generally be to the novel-reader, Dickens' tales are always an exception, and the demand in England for the first chapters of this book has been greater than for any other of his productions. The story is to be completed in four volumes octavo, of which the present is "Book First." Such consummate skill is displayed in the construction of the plot—an art in which Dickens has greatly improved—that there is as yet no hint or clue to the mystery evolved in the first chapter. Our Mutual Friend shows no falling off in those other rare attributes of the author's genius; we have the same exquisite touches of humor and pathos, the same wonderful delineation of character by a single stroke—often a single epithet, and the same unconscious poetry that have delighted us for twenty years. The following sketch of the Podsnapperian element in society is most characteristic:

Mr. Podsnap's world was not a very large world, morally; no, nor even geographically: seeing that although his business was sustained upon commerce with other countries, he considered other countries, with that important reservation, a mistake, and of their manners and customs would conclusively observe, "Not English!" when, PRESTO! with a flourish of the arm, and a flush of the face, they were swept away. Elsewise, the world got up at eight, shaved close at a quarter past, breakfasted at nine, went to the City at ten, came home at half past five, and dined at seven. Mr. Podsnap's notions of the Arts in their integrity might have been stated thus: Literature; large print, respectfully descriptive of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Painting and Sculpture; models and portraits representing Professors of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Music; a respectable performance (without variations) on stringed and wind instruments, sedately expressive of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Nothing else to be permitted to those same vagrants the Arts, on pain of excommunication. Nothing To Be—any where!

The American Angler's Book, embracing the Natural History of Sporting; Fish and the art of taking them, etc. Illustrated with eighty engravings on Wood. By Thad Norris. Philadelphia: E. H. Butler & Co. San Francisco: Roman & Co.

We pretend to be au fait on the fish question, and speak by the card when we say that this is a book that will prove a great assistance to the angler, and especially those who fancy they know it all, and who by looking over this book will discover their error. It is a great art in fly fishing to know how to select your flies for the time and place. The color is of great consequence, and upon a proper selection depends in a great measure (supposing the fisherman to be expert) the success of the angler. In this book it is all laid down and scientifically discussed. It also gives instructions for making flies, rods and tackle, besides containing a great deal of reading matter highly interesting to those who take an interest in the sport.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

MISS CHAPMAN'S Benefit at Maguire's Opera House, on Thursday evening, drew together a brilliant and numerous audience, and must have proved a very remunerative acknowledgment of her services during the season. The "King Lear" of Mr. Kean was one of his finest delineations; the peculiarities of his face, voice, and figure—which in more youthful personations are apt to show the slight encroachments of age—were suited to his part, and his conception of the character was a Shaksperian inspiration. He indeed was "every inch a king." In the hut scene on the deserted heath—one of the most dramatic situations ever conceived by poet or playwright—those awful yet grotesque combinations of the howling tempest outside the lonely hut, the incoherent fancies of the crazy king, the exaggerated conceits of the Fool, and the simulated madness of Edgar, all the characters were admirably sustained, and the scene throughout was impressive. Mrs. Kean's "Fool" was a difficult part and well acted. Mr. Mayo's "Edmund" seemed to be well suited to this actor's talent. Mr. Cathcart's "Edgar" was exceedingly creditable. The "Cordelia" of Miss Chapman was somewhat tame, though a very careful representation. She was called before the curtain at the close of the piece, and received a shower of bouquets as well as a beautiful wreath. On Friday evening, Mr. Coppin appeared in Old Phil's Birth-Day, and the comic opera of Love Laughs at Locksmiths, when he was assisted by our old operatic acquaintances, Mr. Hill and Miss Kate Martin. To-night, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean in Richard III.

MR. HEROLD'S Farewell Matinée deserved a larger attendance, not only in compliment to his talent as a musician but for the excellent quality of the entertainment. The orchestra, which was smaller than on former occasions, made up for deficiency in quantity by their really admirable skill, and the care and precision with which they responded to the baton of their favorite conductor, who, as a leader stands unequalled in California. Among the many gems it would be difficult to select that which pleased the most; perhaps the exquisite Nocturne from Midsummer Night's Dream was more particularly noteworthy. The Bianchis—those faithful disciples of Verdi—received the usual warm applause for their artistic performances. Mlle. Tourney, with the exception of two or three notes not strictly en accord, gave the exquisite Scena from Der Freischutz with much taste and dramatic intensity, and was warmly encored. Mr. Herold's absence will be much regretted by his fellow artists, as well as a music-loving public.

THE Metropolitan Theatre, Mr. W. P. Hoffman, lessee and manager, will open on Monday night with a grand classical play entitled The Seige of Troy, which has been for several weeks in preparation, and for which all the available dramatic talent of the State has been secured. The piece will be placed on the stage in a most brilliant manner, and at an expense of several thousand dollars, under the supervision of Mr. James Dowling, stage manager, assisted by Messrs. Stackhouse and Robbins, in their respective departments. Mlle. C. Acosta and M. Weithoff, and a full Corps de Ballet, have been engaged for the peice. We understand that the play is dramatized from Pope's version of Homer's Iliad, by a gentleman of this city, and that the costumes will be in strict accordance with the classical requirements of that age, whatever they may have been. By looking at the cast elsewhere, in our advertising columns, the reader will see the principal characters—names that are famous in song and story—as well as those of the leading members of the company. Two of the principal features of the piece will be the grand panoramic procession of the Giant Horse, and the concluding spectacle of the Burning of Troy.

AT the Eureka fun, humor and variety, and laughing audiences, continue to enliven the house and the treasury. The Wandering Minstrel, a musical piece, is announced as the next novelty, and will be produced as soon as Birch recovers from his present afflicting cold, and his voice resumes its wonted volume and flute-like clearness.

THE FIRE DEPARTMENT BALL.—The list of managers of this ball are published in our columns, and they present as worthy a list of names as ever stood sponsors for any similar festival, and give assurance that the event will be one of pride and pleasure to the Department and all concerned.

GEORGE SAND'S DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

THE American Literary Gazette and Publishers' Circular of the 15th October has been laid on our table by the San Francisco agents, Messrs. Roman & Co. The Gazette is about closing its third volume. It is an invaluable journal of reference for literary men, publishers and editors, and deserves their hearty support. The admirably written Continental and London correspondence make a distinctive feature of the paper, and is always replete with readable and entertaining literary gossip. We give an extract from a description of George Sands' domestic economy, translated by the Gazette's Parisian correspondent:

As soon as Mme. Sand's guest is lodged at Nohant, he becomes an abstraction for the domestics, just as in some charitable asylum the pensioner becomes a number. A box placed in the entrance-hall is destined to receive all communications which dispense the guest from all relations with the domestics. This letter-box is divided into two compartments; one for the foreign and the other for the domestic correspondence. Here, for instance, is the tenor of the notes placed in the latter compartment: "M. Alex. Dumas, Jr., wishes to make an early excursion, and would breakfast before he goes out." "M. Theophile Gautier would call attention to the fall of the thermometer; he begins to shiver in bed." The next morning, at the appointed time, M. Alex. Dumas, Jr.'s breakfast is ready. The next evening the bed of the chilly M. Theophile Gautier has a winter édredon, (a huge, square bag filled with eider-duck down—it is as light as air, and very warm; huge as it appears, it may be compressed into one's hand.) All the guests know that Mme. Sand likes to retain the most perfect independence. It is rare that glimpses are not caught of her passing along an alley, watching a butterfly on a flower, (for she is fond of entomology,) gramineous or cryptogamous plants, or talking with her gardener. She makes her appearance at dinner-time, remains with her guests a portion of the evening, and sometimes reads them a few pages she has written. The eminent writer who depicts those well-known, admirable landscapes, the author who has the grandest style of the present day cannot but be an exquisite reader. Let us say, by the way, that the celebrated readers of our day are, first and foremost, M. Jules Paton, the banker and the writer of the "money article" in the Journal des Débats; he is often begged to read a new play to the actors of the French comedy; M. Charles Edmond, (Coyeski,) the author of L'Africaine and Le Voyage dans les Mers Polaires, (with Prince Napoleon,) and who is, if I am not mistaken, the reader of the French comedy; M. Dennery, who plays, mimes, laughs, and weeps the pieces he presents to actors, and sometimes obtains at this reading more success than his drama obtains at performance; and, lastly, excellent Lambert Thiboust, who is so full of gaiety, dash, nerve, and sensibility, that he makes his work living and palpable for them who hear it. Mme. Sand says, with somewhat exaggerated earnestness, that she follows conversation with great difficulty, and that she is awkward at that particular fence which is called esprit. Méry, Dumas, Jr., or Theophile Gautier, three admirable talkers, (M. Dumas, Jr., has become a little more concentrated, and has grown a little averse from conversation,) would make her giddy. She willingly leaves all the conversation to those around her. It makes one modest for life to have heard Mme. Sand say: "Believe my word, I am downright stupid, and I cannot talk." Conversation at Nohant is not, therefore, so brilliant as one might think. The games played there are innocent; charades and bouts-rimés are in great honor. Like all artists whose intellectual faculties are in a state of great tension during the hours of labor, the hosts and guests of Nohant cultivate infantine and ingenuous games, which recreate the mind after its grave conceptions. A painter made there one day a quatrain, which has remained celebrated on these four rhyme, "chambre," "noix," "ambre" and "choix." I will repeat it to you when manners change, and Rabelais is accepted in everyday life.

OUR little friend Bobby religiously believes that babies come from heaven, by a sort of celestial express. The other day he was called in to see a newly born babe, which lay very still among the flannels. "Poor little thing," said Bobby; "tired coming so far, isn't he?"

THE next opposition steamer day will be on December 12th. The Nicaragua steamer is announced to sail on that day.

Since bull terriers have become the inevitable pursuivants of the "lions" of Paris, the noble sport of rat-killing has become the fashion, and this has started a new trade among the costermongers and chiffoniers. It appears that rats on the look-out for food take refuge on the slightest alarm in the cast-metal conduits which cross the tottoirs in Paris and join the leaden pipes which convey rain-water from the roofs of the houses to the street. As soon as the rat-catcher, by the aid of his dark-lantern, perceives a rat taking shelter in one of these metal water-courses, he introduces an iron shovel in the longitudinal slit in the conduit, thus closing one end, while his companion places an iron cage at the gutter end; by poking with an iron rod through the slit, the luckless rat is obliged to take refuge in the cage. There is one special adept in this new Parisian art, who, in the last eighteen months, has caught 2,500 rats, whose days were ended by the teeth of the bull terriers belonging to the gentlemen Members of the Jockey-Club.

Facts for Land Lubbers.—The berths on board do not necessarily add to the census. The hatchways are not hen's nests. The way of the ship is not the extent of her avoirdupois. The boatswain does not pipe all hands with a meerschaum. The ship does not have a wake over a dead calm. The swell of a ship's sides is not caused by the dropsy, nor is the taper of a bowsprit a tallow candle. The deck is not a pack of cards. The hold is not the vessel's grip. The trough of the sea is not dug out of the ship's log. The crest of a wave is not an indication of its rank. The buoy is not the captain's son. The men are not all beat to quarters with a club. Ships are never boarded at hotels. When a vessel is buried in a wave, it is not wrapped in its shrouds, and when it is hogged it is not necessarily laden with pork. The bow of a ship is not an evidence of politeness. A sailor's stockings are never manufactured from a yarn of his own spinning. The cat-o'nine tails is not a lusus naturæ of the feline species. The sails of a ship are not made by an auctioneer, nor are the stays constructed by a milliner.

The rebel guerrillas have an ugly machine for throwing trains off the track. It is something like the frog used in getting cars on the track. When placed on a rail it can scarcely be distinguished from the rail itself, and no engine can pass over it, even at the lowest rate of speed, without being thrown off. Six engines were thrown from the track this side of Atlanta before the cause was discovered.

To the Public.—Go to the South Beach Bathing House, foot of Third street, near the Camanche, for comfort, pleasure or health; where can be found at all hours warm, cold, or shower Salt Water Baths. The water is taken through pipes extending over five hundred feet in the bay, and as pure as can be drawn from the ocean. The public have only to give this place a trial to satisfy themselves that this is the best fitted up Bathing House in this city—the North Beach House having blown up.

N. B.—The boiler and machinery are entirely separate from the Bathing House.

Value of Health.—Upwards of thirty years since, Dr. Benjamin Brandreth introduced to the community a vegetable pill which has since become the household medicine of tens of thousands of families in the United States, and throughout the countries of Europe and South America. When first brought to the notice of the public, few could be persuaded of its virtues. Gradually, at first, it was tried, and then, as case after case of recovery from many diseases reached the ears of the public, its value increased in what might be called geometrical proportions. Medical men, who had seen patients recover rapidly by the use of Brandreth's pills who had for indefinite periods of time been under their charge without showing signs of improvement, began to despair, believing that the great secret of life and health had been discovered, and their occupation was gone from them. Some, more enterprising than their fellows, at once adopted into their practice the great conservator of health, and their success corresponded with their liberality. Since then, the Brandrethian system has been in the ascendant.

It is said that no habit has spread throughout the world so rapidly as the use of tobacco. This is a mistake. It has taken two hundred years to make the nicotine plant known to the nations, while in less than a quarter of a century the Brandreth Pill, as a purifier of the stomach and bowels, and as a preventive of every fever known, no matter by what term called or from what cause originated, has become the indispensable necessity of every people on the globe, civilized and barbarous.

It may be asked, why is this preparation so eminent over others? We answer, because, above every other, it does its work directly.

It cleanses the system thoroughly of every impurity, and restores the blood to its pristine condition. Dr. Brandreth holds, and his conclusions are based on physiological as well as Biblical fact, that all diseases originate in the blood, and that a medicine which seizes upon and purifies it, places the body that contains it beyond the possibility of abnormal action. It is not necessary to attempt to vindicate a theory so self-evident. We know that a fountain cannot send forth at the same time sweet water and bitter; and we also know that we cannot look for health where the fountain of health is corrupted. Purify the blood system, and life, strength, youth, and absence from disease are assured. These, the Brandreth Pill not only promises, but gives. Let those who would go through existence without sickness or even momentary pain, remember that the preventive from every ill lies in the vegetable preparation whose active and passive virtues no sane man will dispute, known as the Brandreth Medicine.

It is hardly necessary to state that Dr. B. continues his unremitting care in the manufacturing department of the Brandreth Pills; or that they are entirely free from chemical or mineral preparations; these facts being well known and understood to be so. While mercury and bleeding, and other deleterious remedies are becoming more and more unpopular, the Brandreth Pills are extending the sphere of their usefulness by the appreciation of a generous and discerning public.

The Electropathic Institute, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electropathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every namcable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathise with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required!

Farrand's Oscillating

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dics, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quick silver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

THE GENTLEMAN WITH THE CAMELLIAS.

I was going one morning from Southampton to London. I had the carriage to myself as far as Kingston; here a little man got in who at once attracted my attention by the peculiarity of his dress, appearance, and manner. He was in evening dress, everything about him, from the silk-faced dress-coat to the patent leather boots, being bran new. A fact of which he was far from being unconscious; each of his garments, in its turn, attracted his notice and approving smile.

The only thing about him that violated evening etiqutte was his necktie, a blue one, negligently arranged á la Byron under a rolling collar.

From this I augured that he was a poet, for turn-down collars were by no means so common then as now; the fashion prescribing terrific gills, which, in short-necked men, endangered the safety of their whiskers and ears. My surmise was confirmed by his long hair, its natural tendency to curl being combated by the copious exhibition of grease, and probably by assiduous brushing.

His face, however, was somewhat against my theory: instead of being thin and pale, with eyes "in fine frenzy rolling," it was round, dumpling-like, and rosy; his little eyes deeply set in tunnels of fat, which, as he chuckled from time to time, were half closed by his rising cheeks, and presented to view a mere slit; his nose short, turned up, and garnished at the tip with six or seven curly hairs; his mouth expansive, and his teeth very good: fortunately, as he showed them all, not even concealing the wisdom teeth, which were not quite come down.

He was well made, what there was of him; he was not much above five feet high, rather disposed to embonpoint.

In his button-hole he wore a magnificent white camellia, which, I regret to say, I saw, admired, coveted, and determined to possess, by fair means if possible, if not, by foul.

This flower, too, attracted much of his attention; he bestowed frequent glances upon it, muttering what I conceived to be poetry, inspired by the purity and delicacy of the flower.

I was considering how I might best commence a conversation which would acquire me the good graces of this gentleman, and ultimately make me the possessor of the camellia, when he saved me the trouble of breaking the ice by saying:

"Candidly, sir, what do you think of my tailor?"

I replied that I had not the advantage of knowing him, a circumstance which I regretted the more, as his work showed him to be a man of no common ability; I added, that he was fortunate in having a client whose figure and air would set off garments, even though fabricated with less consummate skill.

He tried to look modestly unconscious, and said,—

"And who, sir, may this client be with the distingué figure and air? As you say that you do not know my tailor, I might almost fancy that your flattering observations were addressed to me; but my figure, though not deformed, is small, that is to say, rather below than above the average size; and as for my air, though I flatter myself that I possess some of that je ne sais quoi which distinguishes men like you and me from the vulgar herd, still neither my figure nor air is worthy of the very glowing eulogium which you have bestowed upon them. No, sir, really; no indeed, sir, really;" and he chuckled, blinked his eyes, and cast glances on his little round limbs of more than parental fondness. I perceived that he was not inaccessible to flattery, and did not despair of obtaining the camellia by fair means.

"I should apologise," said I, "for so personal a remark; it slipped from me unconsciously; but you must have heard it frequently from the lips and seen it in the eyes of the gentle sex. You are not insensible to their witcheries; I see that in your eye; nay, that camellia in your button-hole proves you to be the happy bondman of some black-eyed Houri."

"How did you find that out? You must know something about me; you might have guessed that I was in love; but how did you find out the color of her eyes?"

"Well, I did not know positively. I thought it likely, most in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, that you, who have blue eyes, should be enslaved by black ones. Was I right?"

"Well, I can hardly tell you; I trust you may be right, but the fact is, I have never seen the lady's eyes."

"Never seen her eyes! Ah, I see: a mysterious courtship, truly poetic, veiled lady, gentle voice, white hand, one raven lock just peeping from its concealment, fairy form, taper ankles, little tiddly-iddly feet."

"Sir," said he, grasping my hand, "we are kindred spirits—you have felt the divine afflatus—you have struck the wild harp and burst into the inspiring melody of song. We are poets, sir; brother poets. Were it not a breach of the confidence she has reposed in me, I would tell you the history of our loves, our hopes and our sorrows."

"You forget that, so long as you conceal the lady's name, there can be no breach of confidence. She is the unknown quantity; let X represent her."

"Not X; I shall have to repeat her name often in the course of my narrative; she would then become double, treble, or even quadruple X, and she is not stout."

"Well, then, let Y represent her; it is a sleuder and graceful letter."

"Good; let Y, for the moment, represent, unworthily, the name of my adored charmer. I am a poet, sir, as you have already perceived, and not altogether unknown to the public; in the 'Poets' Corner' of the Trottingbury Mercury, exegi monumentum ære perennius! You may have seen some of my contributions to that journal signed 'Beta.' I will just repeat you my 'Ode to the Morning.'"

"Pray don't take the trouble; I know the poem by heart, and recited it only last week to D—— at the Athenæum Club. Just now I am burning with impatience to hear your story."

"You have read my poem, then; I had scarcely ventured to hope that the weak breathings of my muse had penetrated so far as London."

"Why, my dear sir, there are six copies of the Trottington Mercury on the table of the Athenæum Club, and it is difficult to get hold of one of them; yet no one reads any part of it but the 'Poets' Corner.'"

"Not Trottington—Trottingbury Mercury. Well, I'll go on with my story. One evening I had just finished my 'Imitations of Anacreon,' and had taken them to the office of the Trottingbury Mercury. The last feeble flicker of twilight was about to give way to the solemn darkness of night. There was a holy stillness, a quiet calm about the hour, that seemed to soften the heart, to prepare it for gentle impressions. In front of the office of the Trottingbury Mercury is a garden. There, roses should vie with geraniums, the graceful woodbine should twine round the trellis-work, and the stately lily should be there in the pride of her virgin purity; but I regret to say it is planted with potatoes. In this garden there are two gates. I was going down the path which leads to one of them, and repeating a beautiful stanza of my own composition. (I never read the works of other people; it destroys originality of thought.) As I was going down this path, I chanced to look towards the other gate. A fairy form was passing through it. I will not attempt to describe the beauties of that glorious vision. I rushed straight across the garden in chase; but the potato stalks tripped me up, and I fell, sprained, my ankle, and was incapacited for further pursuit. I limped back to the office, and asked the clerk:

"'Who is that divine creature who has just left your office?'

"'That,' said he, grinning, 'is a contributor to our 'Poets' Corner.'"

"'She is a poetess then—I knew it must be so. What is her name?'

"'Won't do!' said the clerk, with his tongue in his cheek; 'she wishes to remain incog.'

"Baffled in my inquiries, I returned to my couch, but not to sleep. That vision still haunted me; I thought of the white hand, the raven locks, the taper ankle, the tiddly-iddly feet. Evening after evening did I lie in wait before the office, in hopes of again meeting her, but in vain. Things went on so for a month, and every day I fell deeper in love, my appetite diminished, and I lost nearly two pounds in weight. At length a happy inspiration came upon me. I would pour out my soul in poetry, I would tell my love in the 'Poets' Corner' of the Trottingbury Mercury. She was a poetess—she would read it; the sympathy which exists between kindred minds would tell her that she was the object addressed. I wrote the lines entitled 'A Glorious Twilight Vision.' Never in my most inspired moments had I so successfully portrayed the inward workings of the tender passion; for I then only imagined them, now I felt them. I will just repeat you those lines."

"Pray don't, sir; I remember them well."

"I felt sure that to whom they were addressed would read them and reply; and I was not deceived. The next time I went to the office the clerk said: 'There is a letter here, meant for you I suppose.' It was directed: '— Beetroot, Esq., contributor to the 'Poets' Corner' of the Trottingbury Mercury.' The dear girl evidently did not understand Greek, and by the similarity of sound was led into this very pardonable mistake. It showed she wasn't a blue-stocking, and I rejoiced at it.

"To make a long story short, we commenced a correspondence, but have never met; but this day she has given me a rendezvous at Pursell's, the pastry-cook, in Cornhill. It is in honor of this occasion that I wear for the first time those garments the fitting of which you so justly admire."

"And the camellia," I suggested, "don't you think that a budding rose would be more emblematic of your rising hopes? If so, I think I could manage to get you one."

"By no means; I should have told you that is our signal for recognition; we are each to wear a white camellia over the heart."

How truly has it been said that the first step in crime is the only difficult one! Facilis est decensus Averni. I had begun by coveting the one camellia, and resolving to obtain it by fair means, if possible. I now resolved to resort to the foulest means, if necessary, for its capture, and to use it as a decoy to obtain the other white camellia now in the possession of the poetess of Trottingbury. To what a precipice was my passion for white camellias hurrying me!

As it was essential to prove his identity in the coming rendezvous, it was evidently useless to try to persuade him to give it to me; my only chance was to steal it or take it by force.

Calling his attention to some objects on the roadside, I dexterously severed the stalk with a tap from my cane, and slipped the flower into my pocket, unperceived.

I then said that, though I had read and learned by heart the contents of the "Poets' Corner" in the Trottingbury Mercury, it would still be a treat to hear some of these chefs d'œuvre repeated by the author.

He needed no pressing. Without once thinking of his camellia, he favored me with an uninterrupted stream of poetry till our arrival at Waterloo Station. I then took a hurried leave of him, jumped into a cab, and, transferring the camellia from my pocket to my button-hole, drove to Pursell's to complete my conquest.

We soon arrived there. Being in a capital humor, I was about to give the cabman a double fare. But what! how is that? I tried my pockets one after another; no purse! the cabman began to eye me suspiciously.

'My good man,' said I, "I find that I have lost my purse, but my portmanteau is a sufficient guarantee for the payment of your fare. Drive me to Lincoln's Inn Fields; I have a friend there who will lend me some money. The cabman saw the justice of my remark, and drove me to Lincoln's Inn Fields, where my friend received me with open arms, and placed his purse at my disposal.

The journey was rather an expensive one for me, for not only was my purse gone, but my watch and a valuable gold snuff-box. It appeared that the poet and I had been intent on similar designs; but while my ambition extended no further than white camellias, he had a weakness for articles of value and current coin of the realm.

It is needless to add, that I did not return to Pursell's to complete my conquest, nor have I ever again met my friend the poet.—Once a Week.

Two Maxims of Montgomery.—It is more prudent to allow a lion to escape than to drive him to despair. A bridge of gold should be made for a retreating enemy.

TALKING OF SELF.

We all know men and women tethered, by a string whose length we instinctively measure, to themselves. Every subject under the sun reminds such people of themselves. Nothing is too remote for this alliance—they cannot hear of the stars without wanting their own horoscopes. Their sole notion of conversation is to display themselves. They are ready to unveil their whole idiosyncrasy to whoever will look and listen. Their loves and hates and prospects are at anybody's service. Their experiences, successes, every fine thing ever said to them or of them, are common property. The whole world is their confessor in the matter of their faults, temptations, whims, grievances, doubts, and weaknesses. They expect to interest strangers by an avowal of their taste in meats and drinks and clothes. They confide their diseases and their remedies, their personal habits, their affairs to any chance comer, never for a moment visited by the misgiving pressed upon them by the preacher: "Is it possible that it should never come into people's thoughts to suspect whether or not it be to their advantage to show so very much of themselves?" Society, or rather their own little world, is simply a tablet on which to subscribe self. When forced by some strong counter-will out of this indulgence, they are visibly at sea, vacant, disturbed; they have nothing to say: we feel for them as painfully out of their element, and are prone, in weak good-nature, to help them into port again. Now, a good deal of this is mere ill-manners. People who talk in this way are either underbred or incapable of nurture, or they suffer the want of certain wholesome restraints that keep the rest of the world in order. Miss Austen, whom few forms of social folly escaped, has more than one character representing this habit of mind, and revealing its source. Every reader can recall that elaborate and inimitable impersonation of self-display, Mrs. Elton, who, once received into the memory, has too many counterparts in real life ever to be forgotten.

Vanity is of course the leading motive to this obtrusive display. Yet the habit of perpetually reverting to self is not always to be confounded with vanity. Mere paucity of ideas and deadness of fancy drive some people into it who have a willingness to talk, and yet so little perception of things out of themselves that nothing apart from their own routine of sensations presents itself to say. No doubt it gives them a general sense of importance to clothe themselves in words, but they have hardly a choice as to the means. There are men who will tell anybody how often they have jilted, under the vague sense that honor will somehow redound to themselves from the confession; or they will found a claim for distinction upon weak digestion, or the difficulties they encounter in shaving. But these aspirations are something apart from vanity. There is a mild satisfaction in being not a mere insignificant unit, but possessed of differences and peculiarities, which is worth all the world besides to some people, and indeed to which none of us are quite insensible. Others talk of themselves from a nervous desire to cover their defects—a restless impulse to set off their presentable points. They are alive to some weak side, which preys on their sensitiveness: as the people most apt to talk of their fine friends and grand relations are those who are deeply conscious of a preponderance of the other sort. Thus very few persons who talk much about themselves talk the truth. The impression they want to give is one-sided. There are probably a hundred things about themselves which, in the midst of ostentatious candor, they suppress.

> "Some faults we own; but can you guess?
> Why, virtues carried to excess."

And the side represented swells to inordinate dimensions, and takes an aspect bearing it out of the region of fact. Or perhaps, like Goethe and Rousseau, they have a notion that everything becomes them—that even meanness or baseness is glorified when made a matter of frank confession.

As excessive talk of this kind is presumption, the habit is most odious in young people. Children in their natural state never talk of themselves. They show egotism by a peculiar appreciation of the pronouns "my" and "mine"; but they are not yet self-conscious. They could not, if they would, unveil themselves—their vanity takes another direction. All attempts, unless very systematic and insidious, fail to rouse self into expression. Precocious children now and then talk o themselves, especially if forced and excited by a certain sort of religious teaching. Then they can be heard to enlarge with a horrible glibness on their feelings, their convictions of sin, their schemes for setting the world to rights; but this is mostly a sign of an overtasked brain, accompanied sometimes by an exceptional, grotesque form of naughtiness, and sure to pass off as the health improves and the cleverness vanishes. When childhood, and even boyhood, is fairly over, is the time for self to assert itself in talk. Then it awakes full armed in a sort of bloom and overflow of conceit, an invasion of arrogance never to be matched in after life. There are not many more unpleasant things in the social world than a pert, forward young man, whose theme is universally himself—who entertains every company with himself, and breaks up every conversation that does not concern himself. These insufferable persons are of all sorts, from the flippant and most bearable who clamors of his own exploits, boasts himself the envy of one sex and the idol of the other, the deep, oracular, and enlightened youth who will not allow us to remain in the dark as to his views on any of the topics that occupy mankind. Or there is the sententious, didactic young man, more than endured probably by some small admiring circle—a teetotaler, perhaps, or a stringent Sabbatarian, or engaged in a course of lectures to "the lower orders," or in some way or other a conscious example, reprover, and guide to his fellow-men. Whatever their line, they are intrinsically the same,—all alike patronizing or indifferent to their betters—all blind to the impression they make—all lavishing the fulness of their admiration, reverence, and talk on one central figure—all flaunting the same self in our eyes—keeping up the one chorus, "I, I, I," "I say," "I know," "I do."—London Saturday Review.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF

Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever.

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'s

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imparts the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION,

By His Excellency, Frederick F. Low, Governor of California.

"Offer unto God thanksgiving, and pay thy vows unto the Most High.

In accordance with the usage which has hitherto prevailed in this State, and in conformity with the recommendation of the President of the United States, I do hereby appoint THURSDAY, the 24th day of NOVEMBER, inst., as a day of public thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God: and I do enjoin upon the people of this State, that on the day thus set apart, they rest from all secular labor, and assemble in their customary places of worship, and, with devout hearts, acknowledge His exalted goodness, His loving kindness, and His tender mercies.

Let us thank Him for the measure of health and prosperity that everywhere exists throughout our State; that although the earth have not sent forth their treasures as in years past, yet want has been kept far from our own doors, and comparative abundance blesses our people; that as a Nation, we have been scourged by a cruel war, with all the suffering, sorrow, and death which follows in its train; yet within our State the wicked schemes of bad men have been frustrated, and peace reigns within our borders.

Let us thank Him for the great and signal victories that have attended the arms of the Republic, both on land and sea, during the past year; for the occupation by our army and navy of so many strongholds of the insurgents; for the unity of purpose which is everywhere apparent, that must result in a complete triumph of Liberty, Humanity, and Justice, over Treason, Anarchy, and Barbarism. And, above all, let us rejoice at the prospect of an honorable and lasting peace, based upon National Unity and obedience to Constitutional Law.

And, as we gather around the festive board, let us not forget the poor and the needy, or those who are sick or afflicted, in our midst; let the wants of the poor be supplied from our abundance, and the wounds of the sick be bound up in the oil and wine with which our hearts overflow.

And, while offering up thanksgivings for the successes that have attended our arms, let us not forget the sick and wounded heroes through whose agency God hath given us the victory; let the beneficent charities, which have for their object the relief of these noble men, be sustained, and their treasuries filled to overflowing by the free-will offerings of a grateful people.

SEAL

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and cause the Great Seal of State to be affixed, at Sacramento, this 7th day of November, A. D. 1864.

FRED'K F. LOW,
Governor of California.

Attest: B. B. REDDING, Secretary of State.

As we, the undersigned, have been, at the same time, under DR. DE CASTRO's (620 Market street,) treatment, for diseases of the Eyes, and as each of our cases has been of long standing and of critical character, and causing to each of us a great deal of suffering; and the Doctor having treated us with the greatest skill and success, we have resolved to give, through the public press, a testimonial to Dr. De Castro, deeming it eminently due to him. We do heartily and conscientiously recommend him all over the country, as a most eminent and skilful Oculist.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, November 29, 1864.

IT is scarcely necessary, perhaps, to inform the reader that Thanksgiving is over and past; still I cannot forbear jotting the fact down simply as a matter of record. It is with a feeling of pleasurable relief, too, that I raise this tablet to the memory of the day.

There was a time when I liked Thanksgiving Days—when I watched their coming with eager anticipation, and was only comforted for their going by the knowledge that Christmas and New Year's trod closely on their heels, and that the last hour of the autumnal festival saw the merry winter jubilees nearer by a day.

That was when I was young, active, and good-looking; before two score and ten winters had sifted their silver upon my head and drifted their snows across my brow. It was in what poets call the "heyday of youth," or the "summer of life"—which amounts to the same thing after all, however, since hay-days are more apt to fall in summer-time than in winter. It was in my ante-rheumatic days—those days when my aunty had the rheumatism and I had it not. It was—but no matter when it was—it was some years back, and there let the matter rest.

But how is it that turkeys have so changed in taste since then? That the times should have changed is natural enough, but I know of no reason why turkey flesh should not have preserved the even tenor of its way. Talk of the times being out of joint—to my mind it is turkeys that are!

The universal question on all sides, yesterday morning, was: Well, how did you spend Thanksgiving Day? It was asked of me so many times that at last I got angered and told people I didn't spend it at all.

Looking back at last Thursday now, however, I incline to ask myself seriously what became of the day. I have no definite recollections of having gone to church, though it is quite possible that I went there. Going to church is scarcely my strong suit, but I do go quite frequently, and I should go much oftener were it not for the discouragements of the last twelvemonth.

Perhaps you remember the affair at Santiago, where a multitude of worshippers were burned in the Cathedral as they knelt! That was scarcely an encouragement to church-goers, and it was long weeks before I mustered sufficient courage to pass a church; but all impressions wear away with time, and a sense of security had once more dawned on my mind, and serious thoughts of buying back the pew which I had sold in the first moment of panic began to occupy my mind, when pat came the announcement from St. Petersburg that a church had fallen in, burying six thousand people in the ruins!

It is not much to be wondered at that when churches fall in, sinners begin to feel like falling out.

I know not when I have read anything that so impressed me with horror as did the details of this latter catastrophe. Of all the thousands that were within the church, says the account, (exaggerated I hope,) not one was rescued alive; there being, in many cases, even no one to claim the corpses that were exhumed from the ruins, the whole family having been swallowed up and cut off by the awful and unexpected "visitation"—"visitation," I believe that's the word. The vision of the poor wretches, struggling beneath the wreck of column and of pulpit, stretching out their arms from under the crushing fragments of the altar before which they had been kneeling for a help which there was none to give, haunted me in dreams for long days and nights.

I am glad it was not a play-house or a tan-yard that was thus destroyed, for in that case I fear the poor victims would have had little sympathy, and I am not sure that a number of edifying sermons would not have been preached in the land upon the sin and folly of going to plays or working in tan-yards.

But I do not know that all this has much to do with Thanksgiving, or how I spent the day.

To tell the truth, feeling in a lazy and somewhat extravagant humor, I commenced very early in the morning and allowed the day to spend itself. I loafed.

Some day I intend to write a treatise on loafing, for if there be one thing with which I am more familiar than another, one theme on which I can write more feelingly and understandingly than another, that thing and that theme is loafing.

It amuses me to hear people talk of "doing something in the world" and of being "somebody." It is a great deal easier to do nothing and to be nobody, and it generally amounts to the same thing in the end.

In any event our own destinies work themselves out, and we have little to do with shaping them ourselves.

Industry and punctuality and perseverance and all such things may be well enough in their way, but I have known them to bring their possessors to grief quite as often as to prosperity.

Very many stories are told for little people, illustrating the advantages that accrue from the exercise of what are termed the virtues of life. Now, I am not at all certain that quite as much may not be said upon the other side, and quite as many and as good stories told to encourage children in their total disregard. For instance:

Samuel and John were two little boys, (if they had not been boys perhaps they would have been called Heleu and Maria,) who lived in the same village. Samuel was a very foolish little boy who always did what his mother told him to, so he very often had to be at work while the other boys were at play, and he only got one piece of pie at dinner, while they had whole ones which they borrowed from the buttery. One day a good gentleman wished to send two cheeses to his sick mother, who lived some distance from the village, and he called Samuel and John to him and said he would give them a bright, new ten-cent piece apiece if they would carry the cheeses for him and not idle upon the way. And Samuel took the money and said he would do it faithfully; and John took the money, too, and said he would do it in a hurry; and they both set out on their way. When they got a little way from town John said he was tired, and he would sit down upon a stone and rest; and he was hungry, and so he would eat half the cheese, and there 'd be more than the old woman could manage left then; but Samuel, who was a foolish little boy, said that would be naughty, and that he shouldn't feel happy at night if he did such a wicked thing. So John, who didn't see it in that light, sat down upon the stone and ate the cheese, and Samuel went on in haste, like a foolish little boy as he was. It happened that while John was eating, and thinking to himself how good the cheese was, and what a good time the good gentleman's mother would have with the rest of it, a weary pilgrim came along, and said he was hungry, and asked for a bit. John said he would sell him a bit's worth, but he would not give him a bit, because it was the Great Sanitary Cheese, and wouldn't set well on the stomach of anybody who didn't pay for it; and he also said that the money was to go for the benefit of the sick soldiers, and would make them well when they got it—and he said a great many other things that he had heard the good Dr. Bellows say on Sundays. So the weary pilgrim gave John all the money he had about him, and put his hand upon his head and blessed him, and told him if he kept on in the path he was going he would some day be an ornament to society and perhaps a Brigadier-General; and John put the money in his pocket and said it was all in his eye, and told the weary pilgrim if he kept on in the path he was going he would get to Oakland directly, and then he would wish he had taken the Point Lobos turnpike road and gone out to the Cliff House and seen the seals and drowned himself.

While John was talking to the weary pilgrim and chisseling him out of his eye teeth, as we have already narrated, the foolish little Samuel was toiling along in the hot sun with the cheese upon his head and wishing it were an umbrella. For he said to himself: I must be faithful and do what the good gentleman told me, and then I shall become a great and a good man, as rich as Samuel Brannan, perhaps—who knows? And so he kept on his way.

Now it happened there was a bear in the woods, and as Samuel was going cheerfully along he came out and nipped him, and didn't leave anything of him and the cheese but the bright tin ten-cent piece which the good gentleman had given him—because he was a good little boy, and didn't know the difference between a bad ten-cent piece and a good one. And when John came along, the bear had gone back into the woods; for he had had enough cheese and didn't want any more little boy. So John picked up the tin ten-cent piece and carried it to the good gentleman's mother, and told her that her son had sent it to her to buy cheese with, and she said he was a good little boy, and an honest one, and she gave him a quarter of a dollar for bringing it to her safely, and that was enough to go to the circus with. Now wasn't John a smart little boy, and wasn't that a great deal better than being eaten up by the bear?

I think that is a tolerably fine story, and quite as eminently illustrative of the comparative advantages of honesty and dishonesty as any that can be found in any of the books published for the Young which the present day affords. As to the moral tendency of it, let parents decide.

Here is a story to illustrate the advantages of not being industrious:

Brown and Smith were poor men, and they both came out to California in '49. Brown was an industrious man, who had worked all his life long, but hadn't made any money, and Smith was a lazy man who had never done a day's work since he was born, and hadn't made any money either. So he was just where Brown was, after all. Immediately on arriving in California these two friends commenced work at their trades. Brown at his, which was that of a carpenter, and Smith of doing nothing at all. Wages were high in those days, and Brown would have made money if it had not cost him so much to live; as for Smith, it didn't cost him anything, because he didn't do enough to get an appetite, and free lunches served his purpose very well. One day while he was rolling on the sandhills and wondering why people worked when it was so easy to live without working, he felt something hard under him, and looking down found that somebody had lost a purse and he had found one. Now Smith was an honest man, and his first impulse was to run down the road and halloa at a man who had just passed and who probably had dropped the purse, but his second impulse was to keep it, and he obeyed that—because it is always better to follow second impulses than first. And besides it would have been a great trouble to run after the man, and perhaps he wouldn't have caught him after all. So he put the money into his pocket, and when he returned to town he bought two or three 100-vara lots with it, and built a shanty upon them, and sold herrings and whisky to the emigrants, which was a very easy way of getting a living. Brown saved money, too, and he bought him some lots and built him a house. But Brown couldn't be idle, and so he went into business, and by-and-by he couldn't carry on his business without borrowing money, and he couldn't borrow money without mortgaging his lots; but he thought he wouldn't quit, and so he borrowed money and carried it on, and then by-and-by he had to quit, and then he wished he had quit before. But Smith wouldn't go into business, and he was too lazy to sell his 100-vara lots, and so he kept them, and did nothing, and he does nothing now, but he is rich and respected, and one of the Directors of the Bank of California. Brown is as industrious as ever, but he works for day wages, and isn't worth a dollar.

So it will be seen that it is well sometimes to loaf—and that occasionally half a loaf is better than none.

If I had time I'd tell another story about perseverance and how good it is—how a friend of mine started a paper, and how the paper didn't pay, and how he persevered, and carried it on, and how it finally broke him, and how he wished then he hadn't carried it on, but had stopped it suddenly, and put into his pocket the money of all the subscribers who had paid in advance—but I have not time to complete the series.

The original theme was Thanksgiving, and perhaps I've been guilty of a digression. To return to the subject. Some people think we had nothing to be thankful for this year; but I think the contrary. We have reason to be thankful that there's anybody left alive, and that we've got any money left at all, and that the Legislature doesn't meet this year, and that there are no more fools to be wheeled on barrows through the streets—but there is neither time nor space to enumerate all the blessings to be thankful for.

Never a year went its round yet that there was not all-sufficient cause for thankfulness, for do we not see the seasons of the year march on in their golden procession? have we not seed-time and harvest? do not the autumn leaves drop like a benison upon a work completed and a promise fulfilled?

Looking out from my window now and seeing the pattering rain-drops fall, while the grateful earth looks up in gladness and the hill-sides smile in their fresh verdure, is there not in this sight alone sufficient cause for thankfulness?

I alone, of all created creatures, have little cause for thankfulness to-day—dragged from the virtuous bed where I lay reposing yesterday morning at the peaceful hour of 10, my head racked with a succession of aches and my brows bound with a wet towel to keep them from splitting, to furnish copy for this same CALIFORNIAN which once before for three long months put me to hebdomedal torture.

It was only when this sudden raid was made upon me that I remembered an engagement with the new proprietors. It is only to fulfill this engagement that I have written these columns of bad advice to the young and good advice to the old which no one can regret more seriously than does

INIGO.

THE BELEAGUERED CITY.

I HAVE read, in some old marvellous tale,
Some legend strange and vague,
That a midnight host of spectres pale
Beleaguered the walls of Prague.

Beside the Moldau's rushing stream,
With the wan moon overhead,
There stood, as in an awful dream,
The army of the dead.

White as a sea-fog, landward bound,
The spectral camp was seen,
And, with a sorrowful, deep sound,
The river flowed between.

No other voice nor sound was there,
No drum, nor sentry's pace;
The mist-like banners clasped the air,
As clouds with clouds embrace.

But when the old cathedral bell
Proclaimed the morning prayer,
The white pavilions rose and fell
On the alarmed air.

Down the broad valley fast and far
The troubled army fled;
Up rose the glorious morning star,
The ghastly host was dead.

I have read, in the marvelous heart of man,
That strange and mystic scroll,
That an army of phantoms, vast and wan,
Beleaguer the human soul.

Encamped beside Life's rushing stream,
In Fancy's misty light,
Gigantic shapes and shadows gleam
Portentous through the night.

Upon its midnight battle ground
The spectral camp is seen,
And with a sorrowful, deep sound,
Flows the River of Life between.

No other voice nor sound is there,
In the army of the grave;
No other challenge breaks the air,
But the rushing of Life's wave.

And when the solemn and deep church-bell
Entreats the soul to pray,
The midnight phantoms feel the spell,
The shadows sweep away.

Down the broad Vale of Tears afar
The spectral camp is fled;
Faith shines as a morning star,
Our ghastly fears are dead.—[Longfellow.

REMARKABLE CASES OF OBESITY.

ANTONY and Dolabella were both men of some corpulence. The Roman ladies dreaded above all things too voluminous a development of the bosom: to prevent it they were in the habit of applying to their breasts the raw flesh of a fish called Angel.

Fat is a fluid similar to vegetable oils, inodorous, and lighter than water; besides the elements common to water, to oils and wax, it contains carbon, hydrogen, and sebacic acid, which is pretty similar to the acetic. Human fat, like that of other animals, has been frequently employed for various purposes. A story is told of an Irish tallow-chandler, who, during the invasion of Cromwell's army, made candles with the fat of Englishmen, which were remarkable for their good quality; but when the times became more tranquil, his goods were of an inferior kind, and when one of his customers complained of candles falling off, he apologized by saying, "I am sorry to inform you that the times are so bad that I have been short of Englishmen for a long time."

Obesity may be considered a serious evil, and has exposed corpulent persons to many désagrémens. The ancients held fat people in sovereign contempt. Some of the Gentoos enter their dwellings by a hole in the roof; and any fat person who cannot get through it, they consider as an excommunicated offender who has not been able to rid himself of his sins. An Eastern prince had an officer to regulate the size of his subjects, and who dieted the unwieldy ones to reduce them to a proper volume. In China this calamity is considered a blessing, a man's intellectual qualities are esteemed in the ratio of corporeal bulk.

Dr. Beddoes was so uncomfortably stout that a lady of Clifton used to call him "the walking feather-bed." At the court of Louis XV. there were two lusty noblemen, related to each other: the king, having rallied one of them on his corpulency, added, "I suppose you take little or no exercise?" "Your majesty will pardon me," replied the bulky duke, "for I generally walk two or three times round my cousin every morning."

In some countries, especially in the East, moderate obesity is considered a beauty, and Tunisene young ladies are regularly fattened for marriage; a different practice from that of the Roman matrons, who starved their daughters, to make them as lean as possible on such occasions.

Erasmus states that the Gordii carried their admiration for corpulence to such an extent that they raised the fattest amongst them to the throne. It is well known that the preposterous size of some of the Hottentots is deemed a perfection, and one of their Venuses was some time since exhibited in London.

There is no doubt that food materially influences this condition of mankind, although we frequently see enormous eaters who are miserably lean, and fat persons whose diet is most scanty. During the late war, a ravenous French prisoner was known to eat four pounds of raw cow-udder, ten pounds of raw beef, and two pounds of candles, per diem, diluting his meals with five quarts of porter; and yet this carnivorous brute was a perfect skeleton.

For the cure of corpulency, diminution of food of a nutritious nature has been generally recommended; added to this, little sleep and much exercise are advised. Acids to reduce fatness are frequently administered, but have done considerable mischief. Amongst other wonderful accounts of their efficacy in such cases, it is related of a Spanish general who was of an enormous size, that he drank vinegar until his bulk was so reduced that he could fold his skin round his body.

For a similar purpose soap has been frequently recommended, particularly by Dr. Flemyng. He began this experiment with one of his patients who weighed twenty stone and eleven pounds (jockey weight): in July 1754 he took every night a quarter of an ounce of common Castile soap. In August 1756 his bulk was reduced two stone, and in 1760 he was brought down to a proper condition.

Darwin is of opinion that salt and salted meat are still more efficacious than soap. All these experiments, however, are in general not only useless but pernicious, and frequently prove fatal. Mr. Wadd, from whose work on corpulence much is extracted in this article, properly observes that, "certain and permanent relief is only to be sought in rigid abstemiousness, and a strict and constant attention to diet and exercise." Dr. Cheyne, who weighed thirty-two stone, reduced himself one-third, and enjoyed good health till the age of seventy-two.

In another case, attended by Dr. Gregory of Edinburgh, the patient weighed twenty-three stone, and by a regular system of diet was brought down to fifteen stone. In this instance brown bread, with a certain quantity of bran in it, was employed; and it is well known that the alimentary secretions are materially altered by the quality of bread. The article of drink also requires much attention. Corpulent persons generally indulge to excess, and in this case, every endeavor to reduce them will be in vain. We frequently see our jockeys reducing themselves to the extent of a stone and a half in the week. A lower scale of diet is by no means as injurious as it is generally supposed; the English prisoners made by Tippoo Saib, though kept upon a scanty pittance of bread and water, found themselves in better health than before, and some of them were cured during their captivity of liver complaints of long and severe duration.

One of the most corpulent persons known was Mr. Lambert, of Leicestershire, who weighed fifty-two stone eleven pounds (14lbs. to the stone).

At Hainton, there died in 1816, Samuel Sugars, aged fifty-two; and his body, with a single coffin, weighed fifty stone.

In 1754 died Mr. Jacob Powell, of Stebbing in Essex; his body was above five yards in circumference, and weighed five hundred and sixty pounds; requiring sixteen men to bear him to his grave.

In 1775 Mr. Spooner, of Skillingtou near Tamworth, weighed, a short time before his death, forty stone and nine pounds, and measured four feet three inches across the shoulders.

Keysler mentions a young man in Lincoln who ate eighteen pounds of beef daily, and died in 1724, in the twenty-eighth year of his age, weighing five hundred and thirty pounds.

A baker, in Pye Corner, weighed thirty-four stone, and would frequently eat a small shoulder of mutton, baked in his oven, and weighing five pounds; he, however, persisted for one year to live upon water-gruel and brown bread, by which he lost two hundred pounds of his bulk.

Master Collett, master of the Evesham Academy, weighed upwards of twenty-six stone; when twelve years old, he was nearly as large as at the time of his death. At two years of age he required two nurses to lift him in and out of bed, one of whom in a fit of anger he felled to the floor with a blow of his hand.

At Trenaw in Cornwall, there was a man known by the name of Grant Chillcot, who weighed four hundred and sixty pounds; one of his stockings could contain six gallons of wheat.—English Magazine.

SANS-SOUCI.

ONE of the most characteristic traits, extensively symbolical of Friedrich's intentions and outlooks at this epoch, is his installing of himself in the little dwelling-house of Sans-Souci. The plan of Sans-Souci—an elegant, commodious little "Country Box," quite of modest pretensions, one-story high; on the pleasant Hill-top near Potsdam, with other little green hills, and pleasant views of land and water, all round—had been sketched in part by Friedrich himself; and terracings of the Hill-side were just beginning when he quitted for the Last War. "April 14th, 1745," while he lay in those perilous enigmatic circumstances at Neisse with Pandours and devouring bugbears round him, "the foundation stone was laid," (Knobelsdorf being architect, once more, as in the old Reinsberg case;) and the work, which had been steadily proceeding while the Master struggled in those dangerous battles and adventures far away from it, was in good forwardness at his return. An object of cheerful interest to him; prophetic of calmer years ahead.

It was not till May, 1747, that the formal occupation took place: "Mayday 1747," he had a grand House-heating, or "First Dinner of 200 covers; and May 19th–20th was the first night of his sleeping there." For the next forty years, especially as years advanced, he spent the most of his days and nights in this little mansion; which became more and more his favorite retreat, whenever the noises and seemc etiquettes were not inexorable. "Sans Souci," which we may translate "No Bother." A busy place this too, but of the quiet kind; and more a home to him than any of the three fine palaces (ultimately four) which lay always waiting for him in the neighborhood. Berlin and Charlotteuberg are about twenty miles off; Potsdam, which, like the other two, is rather consummate among palaces, lies leftwise in front of him within a short mile. And at length, to right hand, in a similar distance and direction, came the "Neue Schloss," (New Palace of Potsdam,) called also the "Palace of Sans Souci," in distinction from the dwelling house, or as it were Garden House, which made that name so famous.

Certainly it is a significant feature of Freidrich; and discloses the inborn proclivity he had to retirement, to study and reflection, as the chosen element of human life. Why he fell upon so ambitious a title for his Royal Cottage? No-Bother was not practically a thing he, of all men, could consider possible in this world: at the utmost perhaps, by good care, Less Bother! The name, it appears, came by accident. He had prepared his tomb, and various tombs, in the skirts of this new cottage: looking at these, as the building of them went on, he was heard to say one day (Spring, 1746,) D'Argens strolling beside him: "Oui, alors je serai sans souci," (Once there, one will be out of bother!) A saying which was rumored of, and repeated in society, being by such a man. Out of which rumor in society and the evident aim of the Cottage Royal, there was gradually born, as Venus from the froth of the sea, this name: "Sans-Souci;" which Friedrich adopted; and before the year was out, had put upon his lintel in gold letters. So that by "Mayday 1747," the name was in all men's memories; and has continued ever since. Tourists know this Cottage Royal: Friedrich's "Three rooms in it; one of them a Library; in another a little alcove with an iron bed," (iron, without curtains; old softened hat the usual royal nightcap)—altogether a soldier's lodging: all this stands as it did. Cheerfully looking down on its garden-terraces, stairs, Greek statues, and against the free sky—perhaps we may visit it in time coming, and take a more special view. In the years now on hand, Friedrich, I think, did not much practically live there, only shifted thither now and then. His chief residence is still Potsdam Palace; and in Carnival time that of Berlin; with Charlottenberg for occasional festivities, especially in summer, the Gardens there being fine.—Carlyle's Life of Frederick II.

A VERY SHARP WHIST PLAYER.—The late Cabinet of Lord Derby contained some good players. Two Secretaries of State were actually fine players, and one of them adds Whist to accomplishments which would have made their possessor an Admirable Crichton, if genius had not elevated him into a far loftier category than Crichton belongs to. Rechberg plays well and likes his game; but he is in Whist, as are all Germans, a thorough pedant. I remember an incident of his whist-life sufficiently amusing in its way, though, in relation, the reader loses what to myself is certainly the whole pungency of the story: I mean the character and nature of the person who imparted the anecdote to me, and who is about the most perfect specimen of that self-possession, which we call coolness, the age we live in can boast of. I own that, in a very varied and somewhat extensive experience of men in many countries, I never met with one who so completely fulfilled all the requisites of temper, manner, face, courage, and self-reliance, which make of a human being the most unabashable and unemotional creature that walks the earth. I tell the story as nearly as I can as he related it to me. 'I used to play a good deal with Rechberg,' said he, 'and took pleasure in worrying him, for he was a great purist in his play, and was outraged with anything that could not be sustained by an authority. In fact, each game was followed by a discussion of full half an hour, to the intense mortification of the other players, though very amusing to me, and offering me large opportunity to irritate and plague the Austrians. One evening after a number of these discussions, in which Rechberg had displayed an even unusual warmth and irritability, I found myself opposed to him in a game, the interest of which had drawn around us a large assembly of spectators—what the French designate as la galerie. Towards the conclusion of the game it was my turn to lead, and I played a card which so astounded the Austrian Minister, that he laid down his cards upon the table, and stared fixedly at me. "In all my experience of Whist," said he, deliberately, "I never saw the equal of that."—"Of what?" asked I.—"Of the card you have just played," rejoined he. "It is not merely that such play violates every principle of the game, but it actually stultifies all your own combinations."—"I think differently, Count," said I. "I maintain that it is good play, and I abide by it."—"Let us decide it by a wager," said he.—"In what way?"—"Thus: We shall leave the question to the galerie. You shall allege what you deem to be the reasons for your play, and they shall decide if they accept them as valid."—"I agree. What will you bet?"—"Ten napoleons—twenty, fifty, five hundred if you like!" cried he warmly.—"I shall say ten. You don't like losing, and I don't want to punish you too heavily."—"There is the jury, sir,' said he, haughtily; "make your case."—"The wager is this," said I, "that, to win, I shall satisfy these gentlemen that for the card I played I had a sufficient and good reason."—"Yes."—"My reason was this, then—I looked into your hand!" I pocketed his ten napoleons, but they were the last I won of him. Indeed, it took a month before he got over the shock.—Cornelius O'Dowd.

CHILDRENS ARMS AND LEGS.—A distinguished physician, who died some years since, in Paris, declared: "I believe that during the twenty years that I have practised my profession in this city, twenty thousand children have been carried to the cemeteries, a sacrifice to the absurd custom of exposing their arms naked." On this the editor of the Philadelphia Medical and Surgical Reporter remarks: "Put the bulb of a thermometer in a baby's mouth, the mercury rises to ninety degrees. Now carry the same to its little hand; if the arm be bare and the evening cool, the mercury will sink to fifty degrees. Of course all the blood that flows through these arms must fall from ten to forty degrees below the temperature of the heart. Need I say, when these currents of blood flow back into the chest the child's vitality must be more or less compromised? And need I add that we ought not to be surprised at its frequent recurring affections of the tongue, throat, or stomach? I have seen more than one child with habitual cough and hoarseness, choking with mucus, entirely and permanently relieved by simply keeping the hands and arms warm. Every observing and progressive physician has daily opportunities of witnessing the same cure."

Roses And Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryo state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

Devotes herself exclusively to

EMBROIDERY, STAMPING AND PINKING,

And she does more work than any other person in her line. She has by far the best collection and the largest assortment of stamps in the city. Her patterns are the most carefully drawn, and her marking is the evenest and the easiest to work, especially for those who are not very skilful. The coloring of all others rubs out, and the figures, if not traced round with thread, are effaced before the work is done; but Mrs. Hendricks' coloring, on all kinds of stuff, is warranted to defy rubbing, though it can be easily washed out. She is an engraver and engraves her own stamps, and thus is enabled to supply herself with all the latest patterns fashionable in Eastern and European cities.

Any customer can get a new pattern cut without charge, if Mrs. Hendricks can use it afterwards. Although there are many others in the same business in San Francisco, all acknowledge the superiority of Mrs. Houdricks, and send the most difficult work to her. Ladies are invited to call and examine her patterns.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, October 24, 1864.

DOES any nation except this ever unite on one word, or phrase, and keep up its iteration till, as Dogberry says, it becomes damnable? In political writing, private conversation and popular adaptations of all sorts, the word "Record" now occurs. It is a biographical term more condensed and more serious than the phrase which originated in the play of the American Cousin, and was first uttered by the comedian Jefferson, "He can't keep a hotel," and which is no longer extant in the vernacular. It is also broader in significance than the coeval term of "Dead Beat," for that is capable of one explanation only. "Record," in fact, may mean anything, and is therefore symbolical of the times which mean everything and produce nothing except the laughter of a hundred thousand men now and then, and most ingenious inventions in artificial arms and legs. Gen. McClellan, a candidate for the Presidency, is the first promulgator, I think, of "Record:" but he believes it to have a different application to his own history than being-on-board-a-gunboat-during-the-battle-of-Malvern-Hill-poltroon-and-traitor, ascribed to it by the man who invents the Tribune, composes the Evening Post, and "villainizes" the Times. What the recording angel which Sterne speaks of thinks, no one knows; he is dropping his tears elsewhere, perhaps, over the angry souls who are killed in battle, and who, (vide Stoddard's poem,) "like a wind of doom rushing from life to death," throw them into Charon's barge, with a greenback to pay their ferriage, instead of an obolus. That wind blows over all the North, and black flags flutter in the deadly breeze, worn by widows and orphans. Is it patriotic, by the way, to wear mourning? Should not we women, when the tidings reach us of the fall of husband or brother clutch the "red, white and blue," cheer hilariously, and repeat what the newspapers affirm we say, that if we had more husbands and brothers we would pray them off again? It is my opinion, however, that when a woman hears that the man she loves is killed in battle, mangled by shot or shell, or is dying in the stench of the hospital, she curses the cause that took him to the field. I know a woman whose husband, a stalwart young fellow, died like a little weak child, in a hospital on Southern soil two years ago. The war to her is comprised in his soldier's kit which was sent to her, and the memory of his last moments and words described to her by a comrade who came home wounded out of all utility as a gunpowder machine. "He was still," said the comrade, "and then he asked for a little water, saying with a smile, 'I shan't want anything long.'" This is all that moves this young woman unless she hears of some other woman's husband being killed, and then she tells over her story again. She does not follow our victories or wonder over our defeats; she cries for her boy's father, and she carries his old daguerreotypes to the photographers in the hope of having his "likeness brought out plainer." And she keeps his blanket spread over the lounge in her room, and is very apt to be tiresome in reading aloud the last letter he wrote, in which he said he never enjoyed such health, but that he would rather be sick at home, and begged her to get Charley weighed, so that he might know how much he had grown since his absence. She is an ignorant, unphilosophical creature; but there are a hundred thousand such at least in the States, who would, if they knew enough, clog the political advancement of the country terribly, put the Administration in the pound, and send Jeff Davis whaling to reform him. I am by no means one of the Copperheads who cry "Peace!" when the Republicans say "There is no peace." Theoretically, I am remarkable for blood-thirstiness, especially when I am at home in a New England village, where the one or two revolutionary guns, owned by patriarchs, are so rusty that the ramrods won't come out. There, I have inveighed against traitors, and eaten roasted oysters, till I did not realize which was which. And here I cannot help being captivated with the historical style in which masses of human beings are handled by civic gentlemen, who give a jump and howl when they grow so earnest as to put the lighted end of their cigars in their mouths. War is a splendid game when you leave out the recollection of the ranks, and fix your attention on Xenophon, Hannibal, Bonaparte, General Sigel and General Pope. But feeling is one thing, and glory another; and as feeling is one of the primitive colors in the female composition I cannot forbid its ray to illuminate my performances.

Speaking of performances, reminds me of the return from San Francisco of Dr. Bellows, the chief of the Sanitary Commission. The merit of his visit consists, in part, in having obtained two hundred thousand dollars more from the able-hearted Californians. I wish that the talented and genial minister would advocate the building of a Retreat for our veterans, on the plan of the "Invalides" in Paris, or "Greenwich" in London. To be sure, we have no veterans at present, but the war may grow milder in time, and some of the soldiers may save enough of themselves to come home, and bequest the care of their disabled bodies to a generous country, which will be ready to "contract" at so much per head.

Mentioning contracts, would it not be a wise movement to start a company who will contract to forward Democratic papers and documents to the army? At present it is not allowed any political food that is not good for the Lincoln stomach. Occasionally The World reaches the camp, having passed through the post-offices wrapped in a page of the Tribune, thus verifying the adage of a wolf in sheep's clothing; but if the court know's itself, it does not permit the diffusion of evil knowledge among the ranks. Bad as The World is, it has a War Correspondent named Stillson, who will prove a mine to the future historian of the war. His last letter on our victory in the Shenandoah Valley is as spirited and dramatic nearly as Victor Hugo's description of Waterloo in Les Miserables. He nothing extenuates in his rendering of the language he hears from officers and men: when they swear, he swears. Sheridan gets up in the morning as our last retreat—for we were pounded badly—was about completed, with the sound of the enemy's artillery in his ears, and makes for the army in full gallop. He asks questions along the line.

"Where is the Nineteenth Corps?"

"On the right, General—in the woods," was the answer.

Going on, he speaks again to an officer, and says:

"Now all I want, by G—d, is to get these men up in the rear and whip these rascals back!"

One of his staff meets him, and announces that the situation of the army is "awful."

"Pshaw!" he replies; "it's nothing of the sort. It's all right, or we'll fix it right."

He rides on till he reaches the left of the line held by the cavalry; then he takes off his hat and waves it. Generals rush out to meet him, officers wave their swords, and the men shriek with glee and throw up their hats. Gen. Custer puts his arms round Sheridan's neck and kisses him on the cheek. Sheridan only delays long enough to exchange greetings, and then goes forward again, saying: "This retreat must be stopped, by G—d!" He gallops along the whole front of the army, increasing the enthusiasm caused by his presence till that part of the army in line of battle became a new being, having twice its previous will to fight, until that part of the army in the rear hearing of it become partially ashamed of secession and come back.

My limits will not allow me to recount Stillson's account further. His description of the scenes at headquarters after the battle, his mention of the noble General Bidwell, who, wounded to death, calmly said, "Such is fate!" are so pathetic, that at this moment, in referring to them, I am obliged to use my handkerchief with my pen, so I conclude—adding in the words of Coleridge that Stillson is—

"A fluent phraseman, absolute
And technical in victories and defeats."

A different going out of life is that of the old English Greek pagan, Walter Savage Landor, who is dead at the verge of ninety. He died as a poet should, in the possession of all that should please the imagination—an agreeable abode, a fine garden, books, pictures, a sunny climate, (Florence,) and troops of friends. He could not live with his wife and his wife could not live with him; but he gave her his house and nearly the whole of his fortune when he left her. He dressed badly, was absorbed and sileut, and did not love society. But he loved liberty, and would have it for mind and body; for it he fought with the sword, the tongue and the pen. He is little read in America. A few know that his Greek poems are great, and that his "Imaginary Conversations" have been made famous with scholars. Landor, in these conversations, elevated dialogue into an art. He dramatized man; his wit, passion, insight and raillery illustrate the progress of nature and human life.

In spite of the desuetude of the times, and the cost of printing, a good book makes its appearance now and then. Lowell's Fireside Travels is charming. Emily Chester, an American novel by a bran-new writer, a young lady of Baltimore, aged twenty-three, named Miss Crane, is an improvement on Miss Prescott and a host of minors who overstock the market. It is original in idea, clear in style, though a little ornate, and evidently written by one who means to be a conscientious artist. But the book of books that I have read of late is the Life of Jean Paul Richter. That, as Miss Bremer says of the clouds, "takes mine soul away."

E. D. B. S.

THE CUSTOM OF SHAKING HANDS.—The time was when on the Continent it was simply voted an English absurdity—a Parisian exquisite or a Viennese, (on introduction or other exchange of courtesy,) merely thrusting his gloved hand into the breast of his buttoned coat. There is a new decision in the matter, however, the Paris correspondent of the London Star informing us that the "Jockey Club," before whose decrees the fashionable world bend, have decided that the English custom of shaking hands is henceforth to be considered the correct thing; and furthermore, in order to protect ladies from the annoyance of having to return the bows of any man who may choose to take off his hat to them in public, the English fashion is to be adopted of ladies bowing first.

(For the Californian.)

OUT OF THE WINDOW.

OUT of the window a white face gleams,
Into the fierce night a dim eye peers,
And a gust-blown ray from a street-lamp streams
On the slowly-falling tears;
This is the love of his youthful dreams—
The wife of his riper years.

The cheerful fire in the little grate
Was faded to ashes long ago;
The supper's tempting dainties wait,
Now cold as the falling snow;
Yet no sound is heard, save the swinging gate
That the wind blows to and fro.

Colder the night grows, the waters freeze;
The loud wind sinks to a moment's calm,
And a step comes, like a ghostly breeze
Rustling a withered palm;
And a voice, from over eternal seas,
Whispers a blessed psalm:

"Come where the heart that weeps
May find a quiet for its burning fever;
A calm, for restless love and vain endeavor
Beyond life's toilsome steeps;
Where joy's clear streams flow on—and on forever,
And woe and weariness and change may never
Disturb the spirit in its blissful deeps.

"As the wild turtle's flight
To orange groves—where brightly green leaves quiver
When frost and storm the northern forests shiver—
So, from this bitter night,
Thou shalt go forth upon the mystic river
Into the Summer Land of God the Giver,
Into His hand—all glorious and bright.

"Come! wilder storms the snow;
The mad wind whirls it in fantastic eddy!
Why by the window lingerest thou, pale lady?
Why movest thy poor lips so?
Ah, pitiful! the rescuing boat is ready,
And yet thou waitest for the step unsteady,
To bless, once more, the author of thy woe."

Still fall the white flakes through the air,
The waking city begins its hum;
But frozen is the unanswered prayer
On the lips—forever dumb;
To the thin hands, the bosom wan and bare,
Eternal peace has come.

O'er the icy brow the fair hair shifts,
Like golden lilies on silvery pond;
And through the ringlets the sharp wind lifts,
The dead eyes still look fond;
But the freed soul onward and onward drifts
To the promised Rest beyond.

Still by the window the white face gleams,
Into the grey dawn a dead eye peers,
And the last faint ray of the street lamp beams
On a frozen pool of tears,
On the wreck of the love of his youthful dreams—
The wife of his riper years.

EMILIE LAWSON.

UNHEALTHY POSITIONS OF THE BODY.—Those persons engaged in occupations requiring the hands alone to move, while the lower limbs remain motionless, should bear in mind that, without constantly raising the frame to an erect position and giving a slight exercise to all parts of the body, such a practice tends to destroy their health. They should, moreover, sit in as erect a position as possible. With seamstresses there is always more or less stooping of the head and shoulders, tending to retard circulation and respiration and digestion, and produce curvature of the spine. The head should be thrown back to give the lungs full play. The frequent long-drawn breath of the seamstress evinces the crimping and confinement of the lungs. Health cannot be expected without free respiration. The life-giving element is in the atmosphere, and without it in proportionate abundance must disease intervene. Strength and robustness must come from exercise. Confined attitudes are in direct violation of correct theories of physical development and the instincts of nature.

NEVADA.—The first Legislature of this State is to assemble on the second Monday of next month. The following is a list of its members:

Senators—Douglas, J. W. Haines; Esmeralda, Dr. John Ives, L. Doran; Lander, M. D. Larrowe, W. H. Hobart; Lyon, D. S. Hastings; Churchill, Alf. James; Nye, Jas. S. Lawson; Ormsby, J. Seeley, J. T. THE PACIFIC SLOPE.

CASUALTIES.

The store, with its contents, of S. W. Levy & Co., at San Pablo, Contra Costa county, was consumed by fire on the night of November 18th.

Mr. Weaver, at Carson Valley, Nov. 15th, had his leg broken, face and breast bruised, and jaw fractured, in consequence of his wagon, from which he had fallen, passing over him.

On the 16th inst., says the Red Bluff Independent, the dwelling house of Mr. Rennie, on the Fort Klamath road, about forty miles from Chico, was burned to the ground. Nothing was saved but a blanket. Loss about $2,000.

A man named G. W. Bennett had an arm broken by the upsetting of a stage-coach at Grass Valley, November 15th. Bennett was one of Capt. Kendall's volunteers, a company raised in Nevada.

A young man named George Pitt, while playfully contending with one William Miller for the possession of a double-barrel pistol, near Cacheville, Yolo county, lately, was fatally wounded by its being accidentally discharged.

Hon. D. L. Hastings, Senator elect from Lyon county, Nevada, met with an accident, recently, by which his leg was badly injured, being dislocated at the knee. He was assisting in the unloading of a large boiler at Trench's mill.

James Daley, of the Kennebec House, was accidentally shot lately, on the Grass Valley road. He had a Sharp's pistol in the side pocket of his coat, while riding horseback, and from some cause it was discharged, the ball entering his thigh, and inflicted a painful but not dangerous wound.

On the 18th November, says the Petaluma Journal, a girl aged about six years, step-daughter of J. J. Lane, of Santa Rosa Valley, was playing with friction matches, when her clothes caught fire, and before the child's mother could extinguish the flames it was so badly burned that it died the next morning. Only two or three days previous to this accident, a son, aged about eleven years, lassoed a horse by the foot, and becoming entangled in the riata, was dragged until a neighbor who happened to witness the occurrence came to his rescue and cut the rope. The boy was badly hurt, and his recovery is extremely doubtful.

On the 19th inst., says the Territorial Enterprise, Warren J. Noel and Philip Delanty, who were working in the shaft of the Burke & Hamilton mine, which adjoins the Michigan, met their deaths in the following singular manner: They were on the night shift, and had started to come up on the bucket. When they had ascended about 30 feet, a dog attempted to cross the mouth of the shaft on one of the partitions, but slipped off and fell into the compartment up which the two men were being hoisted. As the dog fell a distance of 400 feet he struck the men in the tub with great force, knocking them both out. It is thought that Noel was killed by being struck by the dog, as he is not much bruised, while Delanty's death was caused by his falling off a platform below, his head being split open. The dog was seen as he was about to fall, but before anything could be done he was precipitated into the shaft. One of his hind feet slipped from the narrow partition; he struggled a moment, then fell. Both men and dog were dead when found. Noel was a native of Wisconsin and about 30 years of age.

CRIMINAL.

Two Cornishmen named Neal and Drew got into a fight at Grass Valley, recently, in which Drew was shot fatally.

At Boston Ravine, Nevada county, Nov. 19th, Thomas Douahue stabbed and killed Michael Clemans. Cause—cards.

Several attempts have lately been made to fire the town of Weaverville, Cal.

At Panola, Cal., recently, a Mexican killed a girl because she would not marry him, and then killed himself.

Frank Miller, of Dayton, Nevada, was killed Nov. 15th, while travelling on the Hot Springs road, by some person unknown.

The residence of Dr. F. A. Park, Sacramento, was entered and robbed on Sunday evening, 20th inst., while the family were at church.

An affray occurred at Virginia, Nevada, Nov. 17th, in which two men named Caupte and Sale were wounded in the hands, the former severely.

A man named Edward Connor, says the Marysville Express, attempted to put an end to his life on Friday, Nov. 18th, first by cutting his throat and afterwards by shooting himself. We understand that excessive drinking was the cause.

The Boise coach was attacked by three men between Fort Hall and the first station north, recently. The passengers, (one of whom made some resistance, and was severely, perhaps fatally wounded,) were robbed of $7,000.

Van Cornips, whose face was chopped open with an ax by Edward Ring, in San Mateo county, Nov. 10th, died on the 17th. Van Cornips was about sixty years of age, and leaves a large family. A land-title dispute caused the difficulty.

John P. Gallagher was shot through the thigh, at Virginia, Nevada, Nov. 18th, while attempting to make peace between Abe Bateman and Bill Campbell, who were quarreling and exchanging pistol shots. Gallagher will probably recover.

James Taylor, a butcher in Fredericksburg, fifteen miles above Genoa, was shot in that town on the 16th inst., by H. Lufkin, and died instantly. Lufkin was examined before Justice Scott, and acquitted. The difficulty originated over a game of cards.

The ballot-box at the mouth of Sherlock's creek, Mariposa county, Cal., was destroyed before the polls were closed at the recent election. The officers and bystanders went across the street to take a drink, leaving the ballot-box on a table. When they returned, the box had been removed to an adjoining room, upon seeing which one man seized the box and partially broke it, when another caught it from him and demolished it completely.

Negotiations which have been pending for some time, says the Sacramento Union, between the Western Union Telegraph Company and large holders of the stock of the California State Telegraph Company, were closed on the 18th inst. The Western Union Company have purchased a controlling interest in the California line, at a cost of over half a million dollars in gold.

The Austin Reveille says: "The machinery is now building for a large mill to be erected here next spring, at a cost of $120,000. Over $4,000,000 have already been invested in this city by New York capitalists alone, none of whose purchases are located at a greater distance from this city than sixty miles. August Belmont, George Law, Cornelius Vanderbilt and others are investing largely." Reese is looking up.

A NIGHT OF HORROR.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Macon Confederacy, writing from Charleston on the 30th, gives the following account of the shelling of that place:

Wednesday night will long be remembered by the residents of this city as a night of horror. The shelling of the place had been almost continuous and rapid on Monday and Tuesday, but the bombardment of the last forty-eight hours has exceeded it all. On Tuesday evening I counted four shots within eight minutes, and thought it remarkably rapid firing: but the cannonading on Wednesday night beat even that. It commenced a little after six o'clock and lasted until ten—the shells averaging forty and forty-five to the hour. The firing is said to have been from four guns, but I think more must have been used, as any one at all acquainted with heavy artillery practice knows that it takes considerable time in the loading and firing of heavy ordnance.

That the enemy have mounted additional and heavier pieces is evidenced from the fact that the shells were thrown in a part of the city hitherto considered safe and beyond the reach of these devilish missiles. Where that neighborhood is I shall not be so indiscreet as to mention for the information of the enemy.

Much damage was done to buildings and considerable injury to persons—the family of one of our oldest and most respectable merchants, consisting of a lady and four children, were all wounded by the explosion of a percussion shell in the room in which they were seated at tea. The lady had her collar bone broken; the children were less seriously hurt. During the day one man had an arm taken off, and another lost a leg from the shells. Up to this writing, I have heard of no loss of life from the bombardment of the last forty-eight hours.

Had it not been a matter of life and death, some of the scenes witnessed, by the flight of the darkies from the shelled district, would have been ludicrous and mirth provoking.

Many old wenches passed the window at which I was seated, loaded down with every conceivable useful and useless article of household plunder, with their young ones screaming and tugging at their skirts. Others, with more maternal feelings, abandoned all their kitchen goods and bore off their sooty piccaninnies alone. I noticed one of the latter loaded down with no less than three—two in her arms and one riding on her back. One old African, in hobbling past, cordially, but irreverently, wished that the Yankee who invented those big guns "was in hell-fire, and the d——d rascals dat was firing dem, too."

It is a singular idea, but no less true, that the negroes hereabouts seem to think themselves a doomed race, so far, at least, as shells are concerned; but they bid defiance to fate on this occasion, by leaving at the first fire. I have heard of but few whites leaving the neighborhood.

Had a fellow been iron-clad or bomb-proof, top and bottom, the sight would have been a grand and imposing one; but when my attention was even at its height, the thought that the flight of these fiery monsters might be turned in any direction caused a cold chill to run through my veins.

The firing ceased at 10 o'clock, and was not renewed until 8 the next morning, and was kept up steadily but slowly all day, the shots not exceeding eight to the hour.

The Yankees war not only with women and children, but even with the dead. Several shells fell on Tuesday night in the graveyard of Trinity (Methodist Episcopal) Church, tearing up the graves and demolishing the tomb-stones of the sacred dead. They may have been chance shots. I think otherwise, and that they were but following the hyena-like instincts of their projectors.

The yellow fever, I am sorry to say, is on the increase. It is now among our German population, with whom it is generally very fatal, as all previous yellow fever seasons have abundantly proven. Prayer for its abatement was offered up in several of the churches last Sunday.

ADAH ISAACS MENKEN (HEENAN-NEWELL) IN THE RING.

London Correspondence (October 6th) of the Dublin Freeman's Journal.

THE glories of Astley's have been at length revived, and everybody is going to see Miss Adah Isaacs Menken, "the most daring actress upon this or any other stage," as the play-bills say, who appears in the character of "Mazeppa," bound to a wild horse. The lady (who is said to be the wife of Heenan, the pugilist) is a fine woman on a large scale, and her performance attracts immense audiences, who affect the sensation drama. The horse which she rides is, however, anything but the quadruped described by Lord Byron, as it has a decided objection to gallop, and sometimes makes a dead halt at the very time it ought to make a jump over a dreadful ravine or terrible precipice.

(From the London Post, October 7th.)

The revival of the popular spectacle of Mazeppa, which took place at Astley's Theatre on Monday evening last, under the management of Mr. E. T. Smith, was attended with such unequivocal success that the performance is likely to improve the fortunes of the establishment. The immediate object of the reproduction of this long-remembered piece was to afford the public an opportunity of witnessing another "sensation" in the shape of a lady playing the part of "Mazeppa," and performing those feats of agility and prowess which have heretofore been accomplished, not by Mazeppa himself, but by "deputy." The name of the lady is Adah Isaacs Menken, and she appears to be gifted with all those qualities which tend to make a graceful and impassioned actress, where physical rather than mental force is essentially required. She went through the entire representation with a strength of nerve and an amount of masculine vigor and intensity which certainly startled the spectators, and, when lashed to the back of a wild horse, she performed the perilous journey over the rocks, they rewarded her with the most vociferous tokens of their entire satisfaction and hearty approval. As regards the costume worn by the lady, it may be right to say, in the face of the pictures which have been exhibited of her throughout the metropolis for some time past, that, although it is by no means according to the most approved laws which govern the fashions, even of the stage, it is not so objectionable to the eye of delicacy as the numerous visitors to the theatres have been led to anticipate. The piece is admirably mounted, and the numerous well-trained horses seemed so perfectly at home in their old quarters, that the entire spectacle "went off" in a manner which must be considered fully worthy of the bygone days of Astley's.

(From the London Times, October 7th.)

Miss Menken plays her game without a dummy, and fairly ascends the greatest possible height. The combats and other athletic feats belonging to the part she performs with wonderful vigor and spirits, a magnificent figure greatly increasing the effect of her achievements. Something should be said about her costume. Female attire is almost as ticklish a subject to touch upon as spirit rapping. One can hardly refer to either without offending somebody, and whether the speaker leans towards prudery or coquetry, his peril will be about the same. However, as many recollect the very scanty attire worn by Mr. Cartlitch and his successors in the performance of Mazeppa, and many think that this ultra-classical costume must look odd upon a lady, it is but fair to state that Miss Menken has made the Polish oppressor much more merciful than of yore to the wardrobe of the young Tartar. Her dress is certainly not one that Queen Elizabeth would have recommended to her maids of honor, but certainly, also, it is not a whit more objectionable than those of the female Highland boys and mythological beauties who are now accepted as matters of course.

PROF. BACHE.—We regret to hear, says the N. Y. Express, that this gentleman, for twenty-one years Chief of the U. S. Coast Survey, and so eminent and useful in his profession, has been for some months past incapable of discharging the duties of his position. He is afflicted with an affection of the brain, a disease which has become so common of late years among men of middle age as well as those in the decline of life. Professor Bache is now with his friend, Professor Pierce, in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

PISCATOR AND PISCATRIX.

LINES WRITTEN TO AN ALBUM PRINT.

As on this pictured page I look,
This pretty tale of line and hook,
As though it were a novel-book,
Amuses and engages;
I know them both, the boy and girl;
She is the daughter of the Earl,
The lad (that has his hair in curl,)
My Lord the County's page is.

A pleasant place for such a pair;
The fields lie basking in the glare;
No breath of wind the heavy air
Of lazy summer quickens.
Hard by, yon see the castle tall;
The village nestles round the wall,
As round about the hen, its small
Young progeny of chickens.

It is too hot to pace the keep;
To climb the turret is too steep;
My Lord the Earl is dosing deep,
His noonday dinner over;
The postern-warder is asleep,
(Perhaps they've bribed him not to peep,)
And so from out the gate they creep,
And cross the fields of clover.

Their lines into the brook they launch;
He lays his cloak upon a branch,
To guarantee his Lady Blanche
's delicate complexion:
He takes his rapier from his haunch,
That beardless doughty champion stanch;
He'd drill it through the rival's paunch
That questioned his affection!

O heedless pair of sportsmen slack!
You never mark, through trout or jack,
Or little foolish tickleback,
Your baited snares may capture.
What care has she for line and hook?
She turns her back upon the brook,
Upon her lover's eyes to look
In sentimental rapture.

O loving pair! as thus I gaze
Upon the girl who smiles always,
The little hand that ever plays
Upon the lover's shoulder;
In looking at your pretty shapes,
A sort of envious wish escapes
(Such as the fox had for the grapes)
The poet, your beholder.

To be brave, handsome, twenty-two;
With nothing else on earth to do,
But all day long to bill and coo;
It were a pleasant calling.
And had I such a partner sweet;
A tender heart for mine to beat,
A gentle hand my clasp to meet—
I'd let the world flow at my feet,
And never heed its brawling.

JEMIMA JACOBS.

I AM married, and long out of business now, but some fifteen years ago, I was an assistant-matron in a prison for female convicts, situated on the south side of London. I am not inclined to give its particular name, though I got good reports and a fair share of promotion in the establishment, and left it with the character of an efficient officer; for the story I am about to tell might appear somewhat compromising in the eyes of strict lady-superintendents, if it ever came across them.

Well, I had been about a year in the service, and got fully acquainted with its duties, when a Jewess named Jemima Jacobs was placed in my ward. She was young—not over twenty, I should say—but not at all handsome, being coarse-featured, squat, and of a dirty-brown complexion, which the prison-dress did not improve, as you may imagine. Her trial had taken place at the Central Criminal Court, on a charge of stealing plate and jewelry to a large amount from a wealthy Jewish family in which she had been kitchen-maid. The evidence was clear against her, the family being the chief witnesses. Jacobs was convicted, and sentenced to a year's penal servitude—a lenient sentence, as it was thought, for her offence. But the family, while they appeared against her, were unanimous on the subject of her previous good conduct, and shewed a laudable anxiety to mitigate her punishment by all the means in their power.

After her arrival within our penal walls, no visiting-day elapsed without some of them coming to see and converse with their unlucky kitchen-maid. As my readers are (as I hope) without experience of prison-discipline, I may mention that such interviews take place through two opposite grates—the convict standing at the inner, her friends at the outer one, and a prison-officer seated in the space between them, to see that nothing is said or done contrary to regulations. I frequently occupied that post, and thus had an opportunity of seeing the whole family, for they came in turn by ones and by twos. Let me premise that their name was Josephs, and their place of business a notable one in Cheapside, with a jeweler's shop in front, and a pawnbroker's office round the corner. They consisted, as far as I ever knew, of a father and a son, a mother and two daughters. The father, a tall, thin, stooping man, who looked as if he had cried "Clo" in his time, was always rather shabbily dressed. The son was exactly like him, only some inches shorter; to me he did not look many years younger, though, of course, he must have been; and I cannot say how I found out that his name was Samuel. Probably it was from hearing his mother call him so, for he came with her the first day. She was an enormous woman, dressed in expensive but half-soiled finery. Her two daughters were handsome, dashing girls, with full faces, an abundance of jewellery, and very fashionable bonnets. They mostly came in their carriage to the top of the road in which the prison was situated; there it waited for them till the interview was over, and father, mother, son, or daughters never stayed more than five minutes. The sight of Jacobs and the exchange of a very few words with her seemed to satisfy them, but one and all accosted her with the same sorrowful kindness, as if deeply grieved by her unfortunate position. There was a brief inquiry after her health, an admonition to submit implicitly to the prison regulations, and consider them all for her good, and a declaration that they would take her back again to their service, at the expiration of her sentence, if she behaved well. Jacobs made suitable responses and very humble acknowledgments; but one thing struck me as remarkable, and it was never omitted in one of their visits—they never went without asking if she had come to a proper repentance of her great sin yet, and Jacobs as invariably answered: "I'm afraid I have not." This was so regularly done, that I at last concluded it must have some religious signification known only to the Jews. The conduct of the Josephs towards their convicted kitchen-maid was certainly more amiable than Gentiles generally show in like circumstances. But we matrons and assistants soon began to think that the cause might be found in Jacobs herself. A more civil or submissive creature, no prison-officer could desire to have in charge. In fact, Jacobs required little care; she scrubbed the stone floors, made the rough bags, was locked up at night, and even attended the chapel with the same unmurmuring humility. Jacobs gave no trouble; and anybody accustomed to look after female convicts, will have an idea of what a rare jewel she must have appeared in our eyes, and what a contrast she presented to the other women of the ward.

I am not going to enter on the woes of an assistant matron, but the unexampled good-behavior of my new prisoner, while it spared my nerves and temper, could not but gain my best regards. I positively liked Jacobs before she had been a fortnight under my charge, and the poor Jewess seemed to return my good will. There was no trouble she wouldn't have taken, no haste she wouldn't have made to serve me; she ran without being called, fetched and carried without being bidden; and when allowed to clean my room, as a reward for good-conduct, because it conferred additional liberty, she made everything look as bright and polished as if it had been new. I was pleased, of course; but cleaning and scouring appeared to be Jacob's hobby—an uncommon one for a Jewess—and still more rare among the inhabitants of our wards. All the time she could spare from prison-work was devoted to sweeping, scrubbing, and polishing up her own cell in every corner. Walls, floor, and even the ceiling got the benefit of her exertions; she reached them with an agility which nobody would expect from her squat figure. Almost the entire ward was indebted to her in this way, which brings me to the only troublesome inclination Jacobs ever showed. There was no such thing as getting her to rest or remain in a cell more than two or three weeks; once it was fairly scoured out, and there was nothing more for Jacobs to clean, not a speck of dust left on its bare walls or in its four corners, she became uneasy, restless, always imploring leave to change with her next neighbor. Prison-rules do not recognise such humors, but, as in the working of every system, rules will be relaxed and modified according to character and circumstances, so in female convict establishments, the good-will of officers, the consideration of directors, and sometimes the general desire for as much of a quiet life as can be got in such places, admit of small matters and allowances beyond the strict regulations. Jacobs seemed to understand the fact, and took her measures accordingly. The only request she ever made to directors, lady-superintendent, or chaplain—the only privilege she ever coaxed from me, in return for her spontaneous services—the only approach to intimacy with her fellow-prisoners she ever tried, was for leave to exchange her cell. There was a report among us—I know not how it originated—to the effect that the Josephs had made interest in her favor with the prison authorities. Whatever the influence brought to bear on the case might be, certain it was that Jacob's request was always granted; she got leave to exchange. I could not be more obdurate than the directors to a creature who served me with such zeal; and as for her fellow-prisoners, though by no means inclined to assist or gratify each other generally, they were somehow willing enough to oblige Jacobs. In short, before half the time of her sentence elapsed, she had made the round of the entire ward; and at last requested, with her usual pertinacious humility, an immediate transfer to No. 49, the last cell at the extreme end of the corridor, and the only one she had not tried.

No. 49 was indeed a sort of forgotten or unused cell, partly because it was out of the way, and partly because there was a dark tradition attached to it. I must tell you that my ward formed part of what was called the old prison, a division of the building much more ancient than the rest, which, in former times, had been appropriated to male convicts, and a noted burglar was said to have escaped public execution by hanging himself in that very cell. Such stories can never be got to die out, particularly in prisons; but it was hushed up as far as possible, to save the officers trouble in case the cell should be wanted. That did not happen, to my great satisfaction, and No. 49 was left in its emptiness till Jacobs took a fancy to occupy it. Whether she had heard the tale or not, I had no certainty; it was very likely that some old inhabitant of the prison would soon make her aware of it. I advised the Jewess against her meditated exchange, told her she could not expect to have another, after going round the ward as she had done, warned her that No. 49 was the most solitary, and probably, from its long emptiness, the coldest of all the cells; but my advices and warnings were alike in vain. Humbly obstinate as ever, in Jacobs would go, and in she went. I determined, in my wrath, that she should not make another flitting in a hurry, whatever recollections of the burglar might arise. But, to my agreeable surprise, Jacobs appeared to think nothing about him; she scrubbed, and cleaned, and polished No. 49 with as much energy as she had shown in her former apartments—if possible, I thought rather more. The ward-women were unanimous that she knew all about the burglar, but in the cell Jacobs remained, as if perfectly satisfied at last; and when nearly a month had passed away, I congratulated myself on the prospect of no more removals.

In the meantime, the Josephs kept on coming to see her at the grate, chiefly the mother and daughters; indeed, I observed that the gentlemen of the family, having doubtless more business on their hands, were but rare visitors, particularly the son Samuel. The dialogue was always the same, concluding with the accustomed inquiry regarding her repentance, which Jacobs continued to answer in the negative; and it appeared to me that the Josephs heard that reply with increased sorrow every day. Their ex-kitchen maid did not seem to share their grief; she made the accustomed response humbly and calmly, as if certain that the requisite amount of contrition would come in good time; and I could not help thinking it a sort of Jewish penance which made her take to the scrubbing and scouring of her out of-the-way cell more resolutely after every visit.

Things had been going on in that fashion for some time. It was mid-winter, and, besides being unusually cold, a season of peculiar concern to us matrons and assistants. Whoever has had to with female convict establishments, will be aware that, in the dark December, or rather in the Christmas and New Year times, there is always a disposition to small riots among the inhabitants of the cells. Whether it arises from the remembrance of former festivities, contrasting with the monotony of prison life, or to some occult influence of the season acting on the spirits and tempers of those difficult subjects, I cannot say; but certain I am, from woeful experience, that more windows are then broken, more blankets and sheets torn up, more fierce battles fought, and more women carried off screaming to the dark cells, than at any other period of the year. We had nothing of the kind as yet, and were hoping to get over the troublesome time in comparative quiet; but increased watchfulness was nevertheless considered necessary, and those who did the night duty were enjoined to make the round of the wards more frequently than usual. A dreary business it was for the assistant matrons to whom the work generally fell to pace about all the long winter night through those gloomy stone-passages, wrapped in a cloak, and with lantern in hand, listening for every sound, looking in at the inspection-hole above every cell door, and anxiously wishing for the six o'clock bell, which would relieve their watch.

I was on duty one night about the middle of December. I had made the stipulated rounds and found everything quiet, when it occurred to me, about three o'clock in the morning, the weariest hour in the whole watch, that all night long I had not looked into or even approached No. 49. As I have said, the cell was out of the way; there was a sort of bend or angle in the passage which led to its door, and might have suited for its ancient use—namely, the condemned cell of the old prison. Jacobs had never given any trouble, and was certainly not a breaking-out subject. I felt it no neglect of duty to leave her alone from hour to hour, while all the rest of the wards were duly inspected; but, for regulations' sake, I felt that I ought to see the door of No. 49, as this was almost my last round. Back I went in its direction; and let me remark that I had on a pair of list-slippers, which were thought perfect treasures to a matron on the night-watch for their noiseless; but judge of my amazement and confusion when, on softly approaching the cell of my model prisoner, I caught a low rasping sound, as if something were being done with a file or chisel. There was a faint light, too; I shaded my lantern, and looked through the inspection-hole. The gas was burning very low, and, crouched in the corner, with her face close to the floor, but working with both hands and a small bit of broken iron, as if to widen a crevice she had made between it and the wall, I saw the hitherto quiet and most manageable Jacobs. She had not heard, and couldn't see me; and, great as my surprise was, my curiosity to know what she could be about, or intend by making that crevice, was still greater. I stood for a minute or two watching her work, and soon perceived that the object was to get her fingers in or something out. The effort seemed desperate, for her hands were scratched and bleeding in many places by coming in contact with the sharp edges of the stone and the broken bit of iron; but at length she succeeded in getting two fingers into the crevice, and out with them came a string of beads so brilliant that they flashed like so many drops of fire in the faint gas-light.

"What on earth are you doing, Jacobs?" said I, speaking out my own astonishment: and the Jewess turned round with a far less amazed look than mine must have been.

"You have caught me, miss," she said, in her customary low and humble tone. "I knew you would; but you won't be hard on me; you are a merciful lady; the Josephs will make you any present you may like; and may-be you would be good enough to take this," she continued, coming close to the locked door, and presenting to me, through the inspection-hole, a small but very brilliant pin.

"No, Jacobs," said I, "I will not take any bribe from you, and I want nothing from the Josephs; but I want to know what you have been doing up at this hour in your cell, and what was that you took out of the crevice between the wall and the floor."

"I'll tell you all, miss, and leave my case to your charity," said Jacobs: "thank my stars, the women are too far off to hear a word." I knew that was correct, and it made me stand at the inspection-hole, to hear her tell, in the dead silence of the winter-night, one of the most singular tales of device and endurance that ever came to my knowledge.

The string of brilliant beads was an old-fashioned diamond necklace, valued at, I forget how many thousands. It had been sold or pawned—Jacobs would not decidedly say which, but I believe the latter—to a grand-uncle of the Josephs, who carried on a business similar to their own, but on a much more extended scale, by a certain Russian countess who came in the train of the Emperor Alexander, when the allied sovereigns visited England. The transaction was a private one, to be kept from the knowledge of the lady's family, and doubtless the Josephs' grand-uncle had his own reasons for keeping a strict silence on the subject. Yet some intimation of the diamonds and their whereabouts must have reached a noted gang of burglars, who infested London early in the Twenties, for they made an attack on his premises one night, and carried off, among other spoils of less value, the Russian countess's necklace. The grand-uncle had pursued them with all the force of law, and with all the power of riches. Many of the gang were taken, and among them the leader, in whose possession the diamonds were believed to remain. But no bribe, no promise that the Jewish attorney employed for the purpose could offer, would induce him to give the smallest information regarding the place of their concealment. The man was a strange and desperate character, and owed the firm a grudge on account of a brother in the same trade, whom they had been instrumental in bringing to justice, for an unsuccessful endeavor after those very diamonds. He stood out stoutly against every persecution. The Jew should get no knowledge out of him; he would make no confession; he would not be executed; and the burglar kept his word in the manner already mentioned, leaving his cell invested with traditional terrors for all future prisoners. But the Josephs' attorney, in the course of his frequent conferences with him and his associates, made one discovery, or rather guess. From hints inadvertantly dropped, and looks involuntarily cast, he took a suspicion that, in spite of prison-searchers and other improbabilities, the diamonds had been smuggled in with the chief of the robbers, and hidden in some crevice of his condemned cell. Like a prudent son of Israel, the attorney had kept that surmise for his own future benefit; but years passed, and no opportunity for acting upon it came within his reach. He grew old, infirm, and ready to retire from business, in which it appeared he had not realized much money; and then it occurred to him, as a proper and profitable course, to sell his suspicion for a respectable sum to the surviving relatives of the diamond-loser. According to Jacobs, the bargain had been a stiff one, though, owing to the lapse of time, the failure of memory, and the alterations made in the old prison, it was impossible for the attorney to say what cell the burglar had occupied. By judicious inquiries, however, the Josephs found out that such a cell still existed, marked and made memorable by its peculiar legend; and their kitchen-maid, Jemima, being of pure Jewish race, and a distant relation, volunteered to recover the family treasure by an expedient and for a reward which nobody but a descendant of him who served the fourteen years for Laban's daughter would have thought of.

It appeared she had fixed her affections on their son Samuel—whether on account of his being the heir of the house, or for some special attraction which she had discovered in him, Jemima did not make clear to me—but on the strength of a promise that she should be made Mrs. Samuel Josephs, if her scheme proved successful, this true daughter of Jacob (of course with the connivance of the family) stole plate and other valuables, concealed them in her box of clothes; incurred suspicion and search; was committed, tried, and sentenced to a year of penal servitude within the prison where the diamonds were believed to be hidden. She depended on her own ingenuity for getting into the dreaded cell, and discovering the hiding-place; hence her frequent removals her scrubbing and scouring propensities, and, I sincerely believe, her humble service to me. How she contrived to bribe the women to those exchanges of small articles of jewelry, brought to the prison, and retained in spite of hair-cutting and changes of clothes, Jacobs frankly confessed, for the pin she offered me was one of them. But the most curious part of the business, to my thinking, was the Josephs' regular question concerning her repentance, which was nothing less than an agreed-on signal, and meant: "Have you found them yet?" Jacobs made a perfectly clean breast—there was no one within possible earshot—and when she told me all, the poor Jewess concluded with that sad and simple appeal: "I leave my case to your charity, miss."

Perhaps it was weakness, perhaps it was something worse, in an assistant-matron—but, notwithstanding the gravity of that title and office, I was but a young woman at the time; moreover, I was keeping company on my Sundays out with Mr. John Adams, my present lord and master: we were engaged in waiting only till he got a step higher in a certain city office, and could begin housekeeping with respectable prospects. My own little romance made me sympathize with poor Jemima more than I ought to have done, according to strict regulations. I promised, on the spot, never to report, never to reveal her secret; and after a good long look at the diamond necklace, which certainly was magnificent enough, not to speak of its sterling value, to purchase the heart and hand of any Jew, I left her and it safely locked up in No. 49, believing that the energy which had recovered the long-lost gems would keep them securely, made another round, thinking over her exploit, and heard the six o'clock bell ring with accustomed satisfaction.

When the Josephs came next visiting-day, there was a variation in the dialogue. Jemima solemnly assured them of her complete repentance, and the unfeigned joy which sparkled in their Jewish eyes would have been given anybody unacquainted with the secret an immense opinion of their moral principles. After that, no stone was left unturned, no effort spared to abridge the time of Jemima's penal servitude. Every official, from the Home Secretary downward, was besieged with applications and petitions, and what influence they brought to bear on the superior authorities was never made known to me, but Jacobs got her sentence commuted, and was released from my ward and custody within one month, reckoned from that memorable night. She went her way exactly as she came; there was nothing remarkable in the departure of the Jewish maid but an unusual amount of humble thanks and acknowledgments to all the prison-matrons, especially myself. The next sight I got of her was on one of my Sundays out, when the Josephs' carriage passed me in Cheapside, I presume, from the family mansion, and there was my model prisoner seated beside the large mother, and quite as well overlaid with finery. If Mrs. Samuel recognized me, she did not appear to do so. Our ways were different, and we never came in the slightest contact; but two years after, when Mr. Adams and I were thinking of going to church together, a very handsome wedding-dress was sent home to me, with a small brilliant stuck in the one corner of it, and I knew the gift came from Jemima Jacobs.—Chambers's Journal.

Luther's Priest, when the Catholics told him to pray one way and the Protestants another, ended by repeating the alphabet and begging God to frame a prayer agreeably to himself.

STAGE COSTUMES AND STAGE TRICKS.

In Macklin's "Macbeth" there was nothing of antiquity about the costume, which was a semi-military uniform of no, or of several periods, with a masquerade look about a good portion of it. His "Hamlet" was a modern gentleman in a black suit, such as might have been seen any day in the Mall. John Kemble dressed the sad young Dane, whose father had just been murdered by Hamlet's worst enemy, one who stood between him and his inheritance, in a fancy suit defying chronology, a carefully curled and powdered wig, such as never sat on Scandinavian head, and a blaze of jewelled orders—on the breast of him who courted seclusion! Altogether, there were strange things done on the stage in those days; not the least, perhaps, were comic solo dances, or compound hornpipes of a score of "merry sailors," with Highland reels, danced between the acts of the most solemn of Shakspeare's tragedies!

Reddish played "Hamlet" in a bag-wig, which Whitfield, as "Laertes," once carried off on the point of his sword! Henderson, who acted the Dane so well, dressed him ill—in a three-cornered cock and flap hat, like my uncle Toby! Why not? since Lewis as "Hippolitus," attired that hapless young man, of the era of Neptune and sea-calves, in knee-breeches, a jaunty silk jacket, tight-fitting boots, and a little court bodkin on his thigh—the thigh of the son of Theseus! * * *

Originally, Kemble even acted Hamlet with the order of the Garter beneath his knee! He also wore the ribbon and star, with a black velvet court dress, diamond buckles and his powdered hair dishevelled, in the mad-scene. The Vandyke dress, with black bugles, and dark, curled wig—a dress which knew but little change till Mr. Fechter introduced a portrait costume more appropriate, from Albert Durer—was first worn by John Kemble during his own management of Drury Lane. In one respect, the latter actor was the exact reverse of Henderson, who was so careless in the matter of costume that he once boasted of having played ten different characters, in one season, in the same dress! Lewis was nearly as negligent as Henderson. His "Earl Percy," for instance, was a marvel of anachronism and indifference. The noble Northumbrian was attired in a light summer attire of no possible age, and suited to no possible people. His hair was flowing, but profusely powdered; and these pendent locks were prettily tied up in a cluster of light blue streamers, which his airiness made flutter in the breeze. But those were days in which everything was borne with and nothing questioned. The beautiful Mrs. Crouch, for example, acted one of the witches in Macbeth, in a killino, fancy hat, her hair superbly powdered, rouge laid on with delicate effect, and her whole exquisite person enveloped in a cloud of point lace and fine linen. * * *

In my younger days of play-going there was a certain action of the hand and wrist on the part, especially, of actresses playing chambermaids, and rather lively young ladies, which was a trick of Mrs. Abington's, and had become, perhaps still is, a tradition. O'Keefe says: "Mrs. Abington's manner was charmingly fascinating, and her speaking voice melodious. She had peculiar tricks in acting: one was turning her wrist, and seeming to stick a pin in the side of her waist. She was also very adroit in the exercise of her fan; and though equally capital in fine ladies and hoydens, was never seen in low or vulgar characters! On her benefit night the pit was always railed into the boxes; her acting shone brightest when doing 'Estifania' to Brown's 'Copper Captain.'" This refers to the season of 1759–60, when she was in Dublin, and before she had received "the stamp of a London audience." Her "Kitty" in High Life below Stairs created a sort of infatuation for her at the Smock Alley Theatre. Her name was, so to speak, on the public lip, "and in ten days her cap was so much the fashion that there was not a milliner's shop but what was adorned with it, and 'Abington' appeared in large letters to attract the passer-by." The men "toasted" and adored her, the women paid her the highest homage by imitating her style in dress and carriage.

With old costumes, the actors of by gone days had quaint tricks and ideas—as strange to us as their dresses. I may class with the former one circumstance of Quin's "Falstaff" in his later days. After the fight, when Falstaff, somewhat wearied and disposed to moralize, used to seat himself on the stump of a tree and give way to philosophizing, Quin calmly sank down into a crimson velvet chair with gold claws and blue fringe, conveniently pitched on the field of battle!

There used to be an old stage-trick for effect, employed in Venice Preserved. Pierre, railing at the conspirators in defence of Jaffier, addresses himself, among the rest, to a pale, lean, haggard fellow, who, in such a picture, should be kept in the shade. But in the old days this fellow—all exaggerated ghastliness and horror—used to stand forth and exhibit his caricature of fright and famine, by sundry actions, the applause for which was even less reasonably given than that to the Gravedigger in Hamlet, when he deliberately doffed some score of waistcoats before he took to digging.

Mossop, too, had his trick in tragedy, which was sometimes akin to pantomime. In Macbeth, when with his truncheon he smote that white-livered loon of a messenger, he invariably broke in two the symbol of authority, over the unlucky envoy's skull. People applauded the earnestness of the tragedian as thus displayed; but the fact was, that Mossop always carried a truncheon made to fly in two when dealt on a victim's head. The absurdity of the act never struck himself.

More unmeaning, but much more costly; more pantomimic and much more improbable, was Barry's great trick in "Alexander." He never, indeed, tried it in London; and I cannot account for its toleration by so refined and critical an audience as that of Dublin a century ago. In the triumphal entry into Babylon he was drawn down the stage in his car by unarmed soldiers. When he alighted to address them, each man placed his hand on some portion of the chariot, the machinery of which broke up into war accoutrements; the wheels into bucklers, the axles into sheaves of spears, the body of the vehicle into swords, javelins, lances, standards, and so forth. All which likely work having been accomplished, and the soldiers having arranged themselves in battle array, Alexander addressed his easily-provided army amid a hurricane of applause, and O'Keefe protests that it was not only beautiful, but that he "never saw anything to equal it, for simplicity!" Oh, sancta Simplicitas!

And this "simplicity" reminds me of the three separate ways in which Cibber, John Kemble and Young, used to suit, or not suit, the action to the word in a passage of Wolsey:

> "This candle burns not clear. 'Tis I must snuff it;
> Then, out it goes."

Cibber's trick, to gain applause, was to fairly snuff the candle out. John Kemble, taking this in the light of an accomplished fact, was wont to look as one offended by the stink. Young, finding nothing more to do, always crossed his arms at this passage, smiled, and did nothing.

O'Keefe remarks that it is a method with an old stager, who knows the advantageous points of his art, "to stand back out of the level with the actor who is on with him, and thus he displays his own full face and figure to the audience; but when two knowing ones are on together, each plays the trick upon the other. "I was much diverted," he adds, "with seeing Macklin and Sheridan, in "Othello" and "Iago," at this work; both endeavoring to keep back; they at last got together, up against the back scene. Barry was too much impassioned to attend to such devices." Edmund Kean is said to have practiced this trick, when playing with actors or actresses taller than himself; but in so doing he was only putting himself on an equality with his taller colleague. I remember when, in my boyish days, the actors of the Théatre Franaçis used to take me behind the scenes, observing that when Talma was seated on the stage by the side of Mademoiselle Duchesnois, the seat of his chair was gradually raised towards the back, like a driving-box, and this enabled him to appear as tall as that ugly and able lady.

Garrick, too, had his chair trick, in Hamlet. When the "Ghost" appeared between the young Dane and his mother, Garrick, starting from his chair, used always to overturn the latter, which was differently constructed from that used by the "Queen." The legs of the actor's chair were, in fact, tapered to a point, and placed so far under the seat that it fell with a touch. * * *

Some actors have made audiences merry by a mistake; others by spontaneous wit. When Quin, in "Coriolanus," bade his soldiers lower their fasces, (in which he pronounced the a long,) down went their faces in the lowest of bows—and up went the laughing shout of the audience. A similar effect was once produced by Charles Kemble, by transposing unconsciously two letters in the phrase, "Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?" and making of it, "Shall I lay surgery upon my poll? No, not for all Venice!" More intentionally did Lewis once raise a foolish laugh when playing with little Cherry, who, as "Drugget," exclaimed: "He looks as if he were going to eat me!" "Eat you!" exclaimed "Sir Charles Racket," (Lewis,) and, out of his character, "I could swallow you; I needn't make two bites of a cherry!' On the other hand, one individual at least, raised fun, and made money out of his own deformity; namely Coffey, who was monstrously hunchbacked, and who, for his own benefit, acted "Æsop!" There was more method in a whim like this than in the madness of Cassans, a promising actor of the last century, who lost his chance on the stage by preferring to sing ballads in the streets, or acting as a waiter at a tavern, both of which offices he undertook seriously and acted to perfection. * *

There was an actor of the last century, named Wignell, who was so doubly-refined that he could not deliver an ordinary message without trying to make blank verse of it. "Wignell," said Garrick, "why can't you say, 'Mr. Strickland, your coach is ready,' as an ordinary man would say it, and not with the declamatory pomp of Mr. Quin, or Mr. Booth, when playing tyrants!" "Sir," said poor Wignell, "I thought in that passage I had kept down the sentiment!" That he never could do; his "Doctor," in Macbeth, was so wonderfully solemn that his audience was always in fits of laughter at it.

Jomini's Intuition.—Having been summoned to the Imperial head-quarters at Mayence, at the beginning of the campaign of Jena, Napoleon said to him: "I am delighted that the first work which demonstrates the true principles of war has appeared in my reign. No work like yours is taught in our military schools. We are going to fight the Prussians. I have called you near me, because you have written on the campaigns of Frederick the Great, because you know his army, and have studied the theatre of the war." Jomini asked for four days to get his horses and equipage from the head-quarters of Marshal Ney, and added that he would join his Majesty at Bamberg. "Why at Bamberg," said the Emperor. "Who told you that I am going to Bamberg?" "The map of Germany, sire." "There are a hundred roads on that map," said Napoleon. "Yes, sire; but it is probable that your Majesty will make against the left of the Prussians the same manœuvre which was made at Denaworth against the right of Muek, and by Saint Bernard against the right of Melas." "Very well," said Napoleon, "go to Bamberg, but don't say a word about it; no one should know that I am going to Bamberg."

Numbering the Sleepers.—Sleepers in churches are hereafter to be counted. The editor of a foreign paper has begun the movement. While sitting in his pew, listening to the song of praise ascending, he says: "Our notice was attracted to the sleepers, and, sacrilegious as the idea might be, we could not help counting the congregation as a whole, and the percentage of sleepers, when—we blush to say it—out of a total of one hundred and one, no less than twenty-seven were sound asleep."

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all business communications to* "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN, as above.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1864.

TO CANVASSERS.

A NUMBER OF GOOD CANVASSERS can find instant and profitable employment by immediate application at this office. It is determined to make THE CALIFORNIAN a necessity in every family, and to competent and faithful canvassers the most liberal terms will be offered.

"THE CALIFORNIAN."

THE present number of THE CALIFORNIAN witnesses a change in the proprietorship and editorial control. For the future it will be published by "THE CALIFORNIAN PRINTING AND PUBLISHING COMPANY." Frank Bret Harte retires from the editorial chair, and C. H. Webb re-assumes the position which he occupied at the foundation of the paper.

With this number, also, THE CALIFORNIAN completes its first volume. In this connection, as well as in the change already mentioned, a few words as to the past, present and future of the paper may not be inappropriate. To the pecuniary success which the paper has achieved it is not necessary to refer; the fact that it still lives, and the assurance we now give that it will continue to live, rendering all amplification upon that point unnecessary. THE CALIFORNIAN is now owned by practical printers, and the Job Office established in connection with the paper will afford increased facilities for making it, in point of typographical beauty, what the original founder determined it should be in literary excellence—not only the journal of the Pacific Coast, but the equal, as well, of any on this continent.

As an earnest of what THE CALIFORNIAN is intended to be, it were almost sufficient to point to the record it has already achieved. It has made for itself an Eastern reputation, as well as a local one, for the merit of its original articles, several of which, copied at the East without credit, have been reproduced by leading daily journals of this city that would disdain to copy from a home exchange, under the supposition that they were Eastern. Neither pains nor expense have been spared in the endeavor to make THE CALIFORNIAN worthy of its name. In its foreign correspondence as well as in its home contributions the best of talent has been engaged. In the initials attached to our New York letters will be recognized the name of Mrs. Stoddard, wife of the poet, and one of the most brilliant magazinists of the day. With the new volume, however, it is contemplated to introduce new features into the paper. It will be made a complete record of home news, so that Californians wishing to send a paper to their friends at the East can do no better than subscribe to THE CALIFORNIAN. A digest of the telegraphic news of each week will also be given. In the fields of dramatic, art, and literary criticism, THE CALIFORNIAN will also endeavor to preserve that fairness and impartiality which have already made it recognized as the authority of the coast. In conclusion, the present proprietors ask for their paper only that patronage which they intend to merit.

THE PROPRIETORSHIP OF THE CALIFORNIAN.—The proprietorship of THE CALIFORNIAN having passed from its former hands, rests in the following gentlemen, who will conduct the business of the paper under the name and style of "THE CALIFORNIAN PRINTING AND PUBLISHING COMPANY": P. J. Thomas, A. M. Kenaday, and A. A. Stickney. In connection with the publication of THE CALIFORNIAN, a JOB OFFICE has been established, at which all kinds of printing will be executed with neatness and despatch. To this latter announcement the proprietors invite the attention of their friends, and solicit their support and co-operation.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE CALIFORNIAN.—Those wishing bound copies of the First Volume of THE CALIFORNIAN can procure them by leaving their orders at this office. The convenient form in which THE CALIFORNIAN is published, and the varied nature of its contents eminently fit it for preservation. In the current volume will be found the only English translation of La Comtesse Diane—the most brilliant of Mario Uchard's romances: also the story of Annie and her Master, the most charming and delicate stories ever published ...re; the romance of Mary Stuart and Chastelar ...piscence of Scotland's fair young Queen and ...the Notting Hill Mystery, showing the ...hread of crime strikingly analagous ... to the crime of La Pommerais, the ...e late trial and execution are still fresh in the minds of all readers. This volume contains 432 pages. Subscribers for a bound copy can have their names handsomely lettered in gold upon the volume, and the book will be delivered at their residences on leaving their order and address.

THE OPENING RAINS.

SPRING, summer, autumn and winter fall to the lot of other countries, but in California seasons are only two—the wet and the dry. Winter is separated from summer by only a thin sheet of water and a moderation in the temperature and rigor of the winds. Elsewhere people provide themselves with overcoats as winter approaches—here they only borrow umbrellas. The first rain of the season is, of course, the event of year—the event to which the inhabitants look forward with anticipation, and the period from which they date. These rains are now upon us; heavy overhead hung bursting clouds and the showers descend, bearing to thirsty earth grateful messages from the skies. For the nonce we may liken the earth to Danae, and in the black-browed clouds that bend above her we may trace the features of Jupiter. Not more golden was the shower wherewith the god visited the daughter of Acrisius, for every rain-drop that falls to the ground tinkles like a freshly-minted dollar. Drouths, disastrous all the world over, in California are ruinous. For there is a crop beneath the ground, to the production and development of which rain is necessary, as well as to that crop which tosses its green plumes from the surface. Down deep in the hillsides and buried in the bosom of the valleys lie veins of silver and threads of gold, waiting for water to touch with its "open sesame" the doors of their prisons and release the treasure. Mills stand impatiently idle, their ponderous stamps raised and ready to do their work upon the glittering ore just so soon as water shall come to stir the wheels whose buckets, through the continued dry season, have shrunk and cracked. All the interior through, huge piles of "pay dirt" await water that the honest miner may wash; cradles lie laden with young gold impatient for rocking. Sancho Panza invoked a blessing upon the man who first invented sleep. What uncounted blessings should not Californians shower upon the memory of the one who first invented rain? for do not the interests of the country hinge upon it. Of course it is possible to have too much of a good thing, as Sacramento and a great expanse of the country can testify, but a deluge is no worse than a drouth. One might better be drowned than die of thirst. And we hail these first rains as the harbinger of plenty and prosperity, troubled by no fears that the water will not be turned off before any evil effects ensue.

MENKEN ABROAD.

ENGLISHMEN generally pride themselves upon belonging to the nil admirari school, copying in as great manner as they can the stolidity and imperturbability of their cliffs. They stand before the pyramids and make no expression of wonder, they cross the prairies of the West and never raise an eyebrow in astonishment. But London has at last had a sensation; the side whiskers of our calm and composed cousins have at last been made to curl. Menken has appeared at Astley's: the fiery and untamed steed has been loosed on the boards of that great amphitheatre, and the habitués have been startled from their apathy. We can well imagine that at first there was a hardly-the-correct-thing-you-know sort of expression upon the florid and rubicund features of the well-to-do linen draper, as the Tartar youth in primitive costume was strugglingly strapped to the horse's bare back; but this costume was probably pardoned from knowing that the Menken had spent some time in California, if indeed it were not at once accepted as the costume of our belles. We can imagine the wife and daughter pulling the natural protector by the arm as they ask: "Why don't the women of America dress like us, pa?" while he answers that "it cawn't be expected from that blawsted country, you know," and "blawsts" his "bloody oibs."

It seems that the Menken has won upon the sympathies of the press as well as the pockets of the people abroad, for the critics deal gingerly with her costume and speak with a near approach to enthusiasm of her merit as an actress and her beauty as a woman. All the leading London papers, from the Times down, have long notices of her début, and, strange to say, the criticisms are without exception favorable—at least there are none of them denunciatory. This latter circumstance will somewhat surprise many among us who looked to see English prudery take the alarm at something which rather shocked American modesty. Perhaps, in their unbounded admiration of muscle and physical development, the English pardon that in Menken which they would not very readily forgive in a lean and lank woman—or it may be that our public were a little over sensitive in their estimate as to where the line of dress ended and that of nakedness began. However this may be, one thing is certain, the English public find no fault with her dress—and indeed it is hard to see how they could, for it must be confessed that there is very little there to find fault with. We reproduce brief extracts from a few of these critical notices in another page.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

ON Saturday evening, the Keans gave Richard III. to one of their usually crowded audiences. Mr. Kean's exhibition of the moral and physical deformities of the hunch-backed tyrant was exceedingly good, and so true to the spirit of the original text, that the idiosyncracies of "Richard" throughout the play, offered that apologetic commentary on his vices which the author intended, and a feeling akin to pity was incited in the audience by the terrible fatality with which he worked out his bloody career. Indeed the axiom of Dr. Holmes, that God would not give a man a crooked spine and then "punish him for not standing upright," seems to be particularly applicable to "Gloster," as rendered by Kean. There was very little that was boisterous in Mr. Kean's elocution of those passages which other actors are apt to make noisy; he seemed to have wisely conceived that the man who could dissemble and control his instincts sufficiently to wheedle the widow of one of his victims was as mild a mannered man as ever "cut a throat." In a role so generally well sustained it would be difficult to give prominence to any particular incident or passage; perhaps his sudden frankness and sincerity to Buckingham was one of his most striking efforts. Mr. Cathcart's "Richard," was ambitious and clever. Mrs. Kean as "Queen Elizabeth," made the most of a comparatively unimportant character; her parting with the princess was wonderful in its pathetic expression of maternal instinct and pathos. Mrs. Saunders' "Duchess of York," was rendered in the best style of that most reliable and always pleasing actress. During the past week, the last of the Kean' engagement, crowds have flocked to see these artistes in King Lear, Hamlet, Othello and Henry VIII. To-night, the last night, they appear in Richard II. On Sunday night, Mr. Coppin takes his farewell.

Miss Fanny Brown, whose advent has been long heralded, will begin her engagement at Maguire's on Monday in Pocahontas and Jubilee House, assisted by the regular stock company.

Charles Wheatleigh had a benefit at Victoria on Monday evening, November 14th, headed by the Mayor of the city and a number of the most distinguished citizens, which netted him $300. The same steamer which carries Charles Kean to Victoria, will, on the down trip, return to us Charles Wheatleigh. One star comes to fill the place which another vacates. The interregnum between Charles the 1st and Charles the 2d is brief indeed.

THE Siege of Troy, as performed at the Metropolitan to pretty fair houses, is a dramatic version of Pope's translation of the Illiad, illustrated with equivocal French plates. If the tunic of the principal character was as protracted and decorous as the speeches put in her mouth, the "spectacle" would probably lose its interest to the community. Many of the peculiarities of this Seige of Troy might have been attributed to the influence of the Menken on the public, rather than > "The wrath of Peleus' son—the direful spring

> Of Grecian woe—"

But it is not our purpose to criticise the taste of this modern edition of the classics. The characters were fairly sustained, and when the actors overcame a tendency to sing the "heroics" of Pope the effect was more dramatic. The transitions and scenic effects were very good. Mlle. Acosta and M. Weithoff enlivened the play by dances.

THE Eureka keeps its auditorium well filled nightly with the attractions of its really talented company, and by the aid of new songs, quartettes, concerted pieces and comic interludes. The Wandering Minstrel is the last piece placed on the stage there, and it is extremely funny.

A NEW EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE.—Professor Miel, who introduced the "Kindergarten" school system in San Francisco, and for the past year has been well-known as the principal of a private school for advanced pupils, has nearly completed his new building in South Park. It is expected to be opened for the reception of pupils on the 9th January. It will be an architectural addition to South Park, and is admirably arranged for its purposes as a first-class boarding school. It will contain a large gymnasium, for calisthenic exercises after the system of Dr Lewis, which will be conducted under the supervision of a graduate of the renowned Doctor. A Kindergarten will also be attached to the school for the benefit of youthful pupils. The instruction will be complete and thorough; French will be the spoken language of the institution. Its character is to be unsectarian, and the peculiar religious tenets of the scholars are to be scrupulously respected. The experience of Prof. Miel, and the reputation he has acquired at Harvard, New York, and in this city, is a sufficient guarantee, that the liberal promise of his new enterprise will be perfectly fulfilled. The Professor will be assisted by Mme Miel, and Miss Florence James.

STAGE COSTUMES AND STAGE TRICKS.—An extract with this title from Dr. Doran's Annals of the Stage, will be found on our seventh page.

(For the Californian.)

A THANKSGIVING ODE.

POST PRANDIAL.

NAY, bid me not my griefs disclose,
Nor deem my manners rough,
More breast I cannot—dare not—take;
Of stuffing I've enough.
Perhaps 'tis visions of my youth
That memory's pinion brings,
But O, methinks I trace the cause
To more substantial wings.

I gaze around the festive board
And drop a silent tear,
To miss the forms that oft have lent
Their kindly presence here;
And yet my selfish fears must strive
And at my heart-strings pull,
I mourn not empty seats alone,
But one that is too full.

Enough! I come, ye druggist clerks!
Compound your pills of blue,
Prepare the bandage for my brows,
Ye Celtic handmaids true;
What though to-night, athwart my breast
Shall nightmares brooding sit,
And up and down my chamber floor
Shall phantom turkeys flit;

What matters? Let me drown the gloom
In beakers of the sun,
In sparkling Hock and Chambertin
And vintage of Garonne.
To-day let ruddy wine be quaffed
In brimming bumpers soon,
To-morrow senna and black draught
Be measured in a spoon!

EVERY-DAY PAPERS.

NUMBER TWO—WHICH TREATS OF CLAIRVOYANCE.

IF there is one thing above another that I would like to possess, it is the clairvoyant power of reading another's mind.

Who has not felt at some critical moment that he would give worlds to penetrate the thin, firm veil that hides the thought and feeling of another. This must be a very strong desire on the part of a young man, with his first love—a fair, coquettish creature—on his arm. Ah! if he could only find out the true state of her heart! True, he never doubts that her affections are all his own, but then she smiled so sweetly on that gay young doctor round the corner! Could that smile have meant anything?

My dear gosling, in all probability it did; but the only way for you to find out will be to take her to the Cliff House or go musselling on the beach. Here, clambering over the rough rocks in search of shell-fish, you might (particularly if you intend writing for the magazines) suggest life's thorny and stony ways over which your weary feet must go—and must you go alone? Perish the thought! No, no!—she, the idol of your dreams, would share your fortunes; you would live and love together—but if she were cruel enough to doom you to disappointment, the right hand corner of Meiggs' wharf would witness a wild face—a pause—a plunge—and then the waters closing as if nothing had happened.

She will tell you, probably, with a shy laugh, that she esteems you very highly—will always be your friend—but she couldn't leave mamma longer than for a drive or walk—she couldn't, really. The last girl I asked to marry me treated me just in that way. At the close of a long rhaphsody, I asked her to fly with me, (I then thought women angels,) and we would live in a cottage by the sea. She turned her speaking eyes on me—I saw the tears glitter in the moonlight—and said she didn't "see it in that light."

I've always been glad that girl didn't marry me, for if there is anything I hate it is to see a sweet mouth soiled with slang.

But I have a friend who says the desire to know the mind of another has never been so strong as when he has found himself half awake, pacing the floor with his first-born, at 2 o'clock A. M.

Then his wish to know the secret workings of this infant mind became intense, more especially to know if he intended to keep his young legs astride of his neck for the balance of the night.

I have observed it is not the thousand-and-one things we know about out our friend that interests us, it is that least little bit of of a hint, dropped in an unguarded moment, that haunts us like a spectre.

As our neighbors' house is open to us, so are their hearts; the parlor, with its velvet carpets, its glittering mirrors and gorgeous paintings; the dining-room, with its bill of fare, from terrapin to black coffee; the spare chamber; the winding stair, with the brain of the sculptor at its top—all these are open to the friend; but who knows what skeleton rattles its dry bones in the secret chambers? what romances grow musty in the unseen rubbish of the garret? the corpses of what crimes, or treachery, rot in the dismal caverns of the dark cellar?

We do not know, nor should we wish to lay bare the secrets or motives of another, covered by self-sacrificing smiles and gracious suavity; for this distinct life is the great mark of His hand whose ways are fathomless and past finding out.

In sight of the field of battle when demons of discord wage their eternal warfare, nods the yellow corn and waves the wheat; in the great thicket that witnessed the vain struggle for life and heard the piteous cry for home, creeps the fringed vine and springs the spice-violet; over that window where gazes the disconsolate young wife, thinking of the feet that will never come again, winds the tender honeysuckle. And so in the heart: while conflicting passions war with deadly hatred on the secret battle-field, the eye glances its merriest the lip smiles its sweetest.

Years ago, while watching from a window a violent storm of thunder and lightning, I saw by a bright flash the figure of a man standing bareheaded, on a knoll, in an open field opposite. What infatuation kept me at that window, with my hand shading my eyes, watching by every streak of light that unfortunate man in the rain? What magic in these long years, in which I have forgotten the details of a thousand things I ought to have remembered, has kept bright the memory of that night—that haggard face pelted by that merciless rain, the long arms thrown wildly in the air!

I do not know, unless it be that I can never find out the workings of the fine frenzy that must have driven that man among the arch-fiends of the storm.

Anything that baffles our pursuit is exciting: we may see tears of all sorts and kinds pour over all colors of cheeks; we may hear laughtor in every key known to musicians—but it is all uninteresting compared to the sudden tear hastily brushed away, the blush covered by some quick strategy, the convulsive laugh politely retreating under cover of some forlorn hope of a joke. I sometimes think that if this mysterious thin partition were torn away, we would find our calculations principally wrong, in regard to our fellow-mortals. Here, where we have debited some poor sinner with a crime, we would find only some pure aim frustrated; and where we have credited to an apparent saint some noble, self-sacrificing devotion to a good cause, we would find only the deliberate policy of a shrewd head, the successful plot of a selfish heart.

M. L. E.

THE DEVIL AND THE BROKER.

A MEDIÆVAL LEGEND.

THE church clocks in San Francisco were striking ten. The Devil, who had been flying over the city that evening, just then alighted on the roof a church near the corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. It will be perceived that the popular belief that the Devil avoids holy edifices, and vanishes at the sound of a Credo or Paternoster, is long since exploded. Indeed, modern skepticism asserts that he is not averse to these orthodox discourses, which particularly bear reference to himself, and, in a measure recognize his power and importance.

I am inclined to think, however, that his choice of a resting place was a good deal influenced by its contiguity to a populous thoroughfare. When he was comfortably seated he began pulling out the joints of a small rod which he held in his hand, and which presently proved to be an extraordinary fishing-polo, with a telescopic adjustment that permitted its protraction to a marvellous extent. Affixing a line thereto, he selected a fly of a particular pattern from a small box which he carried with him, and, making a skilful cast, threw his line in the very centre of that living stream which ebbed and flowed through Montgomery street.

Either the people were very virtuous that evening or the bait was not a taking one. In vain the Devil whipped the stream at an eddy in front of the Occidental, or trolled his line in the shadows of the Cosmopolitan; five minutes passed without even a nibble. "Dear me!" quoth the Devil, "that's very singular; one of my most popular flies, too! Why, they'd have risen by shoals in Broadway or Beacon street, for that. Well, here goes another," and, fitting a new fly from his well-filled box, he gracefully recast his line.

For a few moments there was every prospect of sport. The line was contiuually bobbing and the nibbles were distinct and gratifying. Once or twice the bait was apparently gorged and carried off in the upper stories of the hotels to be digested at leisure. At such times the professional manner in which the Devil played out his line would have thrilled the heart of Izaak Walton. But his efforts were unsuccessful; the bait was invariably carried off without hooking the victim, and the Devil finally lost his temper. "I've heard of these San Franciscans before," he muttered; "wait till I get hold of one—that's all," he added malevolently, as he re-baited his hook. A sharp tug and a wriggle followed his next trial, and finally, with considerable effort, he landed a portly 200-lb. Broker upon the church roof.

As the victim lay there gasping, it was evident that the Devil was in no hurry to remove the hook from his gills; nor did he exhibit in this delicate operation that courtesy of manner and graceful manipulation which usually distinguished him. "Come," he said gruffly, as he grasped the Broker by the waistband, "quit that whining and grunting. Don't flatter yourself that you're a prize, either. I was certain to have had you. It was only a question of time."

"It is not that, my lord, which troubles me," whined the unfortunate wretch, as he painfully wriggled his head, "but that I should have been fooled by such a paltry bait. What will they say of me down there? To have let 'bigger things' go by, and to be taken in by this cheap trick," he added, as he groaned and glanced at the fly which the Devil was carefully re-arranging, "is what—pardon me, my lord—is what gets me!"

"Yes," said the Devil, philosophically, "I never caught anybody yet who didn't say that; but tell me, ain't you getting somewhat fastidious down there? Here is one of my most popular flies, the 'greenback,'" he continued, exhibiting an emerald looking insect, which he drew from his box. "This," so generally considered excellent in election season, has not even been nibbled at. Perhaps your sagacity, which, in spite of this unfortunate contre temps, no one can doubt," added the devil, with a graceful return to his usual courtesy, "may explain the reason or suggest a substitute."

The Broker glanced at the contents of the box with a supercilious smile. "Too old-fashioned, my lord—long ago played out." "Yet," he added, with a gleam of interest, "for a consideration I might offer something—ahem!—that would make a taking substitute for these trifles. Give me," he continued, in a brisk, business-like way, "a slight percentage and a bonus down, and I'm your man."

"Name your terms," said the Devil earnestly.

"My liberty and a percentage on all you take, and the thing 's done."

The Devil caressed his tail thoughtfully, for a few moments. He was certain of the Broker any way—and the risk was slight. "Done!" he said.

"Stay a moment," said the artful Broker. "There are certain contingencies. Give me your fishing rod and let me apply the bait myself. It requires a skilful hand, my lord; even your well-known experience might fail. Leave me alone for half an hour, and if you have reason to complain of my success I will forfeit my deposit—I mean my liberty."

The Devil acceded to his request, bowed and withdrew. Alighting gracefully in Montgomery street, he dropped into Meade & Co.'s clothing store, where, having completely equipped himself a la mode, he sallied forth intent on his personal enjoyment. Determining to sink his professional character, he mingled with the current of human life, and enjoyed, with that immense capacity for excitement peculiar to his nature, the whirl, bustle and feverishness of the people, as a purely æsthetic gratification, unalloyed by the cares of business. What he did that evening does not belong to our story. We return to the Broker, whom we left on the roof.

When he made sure that the Devil had retired, he carefully drew from his pocket-book a slip of paper and affixed it on the hook. The line had scarcely reached the current before he felt a bite. The hook was swallowed. To bring up his victim rapidly, disengage him from the hook and re-set his line was the work of a moment. Another bite and the same result. Another, and another. In a very few minutes the roof was covered with his panting spoil. The Broker could himself distinguish that many of them were personal friends—nay, some of them were familiar frequenters of the building on which they were now miserably stranded. That the Broker felt a certain satisfaction in being instrumental in thus misleading his fellow-brokers no one acquainted with human nature will for a moment doubt. But a stronger pull on his line caused him to put forth all his strength and skill. The magic pole bent like a coach-whip. The Broker held firm, assisted by the battlements of the church. Again and again it was almost wrested from his hand, and again and again he slowly reeled in a portion of the tightening line. At last, with one mighty effort, he lifted to the level of the roof a struggling object. A howl like Pandemonium rang through the air as the Broker successfully lauded at his feet—the Devil himself!

The two glared fiercely at each other. The Broker, perhaps mindful of his former treatment, evinced no haste to remove the hook from his antagonist's jaw. When it was finally accomplished, he asked quietly if the Devil was satisfied. That gentleman seemed absorbed in the contemplation of the bait which he had just taken from his mouth. "I am," he said, finally, "and forgive you—but what do you call this?"

"Bend low," replied the Broker, as he buttoned up his coat ready to depart. The Devil inclined his ear. "I call it WILD CAT!"

BRET.

TEMPER AND THE VOICE.—The influence of temper upon tone deserves much consideration. Habits of querulousness or ill-nature will communicate a catlike quality to the singing as infallibly as they give a quality to the speaking voice. That there really exist amiable tones is not an unfounded opinion. In the voice there is no deception; it is to many an index to the mind, denoting moral qualities; and it may be remarked that the low, soft tones of gentle and amiable beings, whatever their musical endowments may be, seldom fail to please; besides which, the singing of ladies inculcates the cultivation of their taste generally, and the embellishment of their mind.

STOCK BROKERS IN THE DAYS OF JOHN LAW.

NOON, and the Rue Quincampoix at its height. From the iron grille at the Rue Aubry-Roucher, where persons of quality were alone admitted, to the gate at the Rue-aux-Ours, where the commonalty entered, every inch of ground was occupied—the crowd, as usual, being composed of all ranks of society, mixed together without distinction. An astounding hubbub prevailed, above which rose cries from brokers, jobbers and hawkers that would have been perfectly unintelligible to any save the initiated. Récépissés, actions of all kinds, Méres, Filles, Petites-Filles, Cinq-Cents—all were offered and all greedily purchased. Porte-feuilles stuffed with billets de banque were quickly emptied and often as quickly replenished; but gold was in disfavor, and silver scornfully rejected. Generally the transactions were very noisily conducted, and much wrangling ensued, but all serious disputes were instantly checked. In the balconies of several of the houses on either side of the narrow street sat well-dressed ladies, who appeared to take a lively interest in the tumultuous crowd below. Some of these ladies had little tables in their hands, like modern betting-books, in which they entered bargains, and shares were hauded to them by the Mississippians with whom they dealt, by means of a slit wand. Colpoteurs were continually pushing through the crowd, and brawling out Monseigueur Law's last arret. All the bureaux swarmed with customers, and the demand for seats were so great that the lucky cobbler, who had fitted up his little shed as an office, obtained fifty livres for each of his chairs. A novel, but as it turned out very lucrative, trade had been called into action by the exigencies of the Mississippians. A singular little hunchback, whose real name was Thibaut, but who was nicknamed Æsop, had made a good deal of money by selling pencils and pocket-books, when the idea occurred to him to turn his rounded shoulders to account, by offering them as a table to those who desired to note down their operations. At first the astute hunchback was content with a single livre for this accommodation, but he speedily raised his terms, and in the end realized 150,000 livres by the business. Little Æsop's success naturally excited rivalry, but the only person who could compete with him was an old soldier named Martial, remarkable for the breadth of his omoplate. * * *

A striking feature in the crowd was the number of richly-dressed persons, and these were by no means people of the highest rank, for those who made money invariably expended it in costly stuffs, and clothed themselves in embroidered velvet and silks, and even in cloth of gold, wearing buttons of solid gold and silver. This extravagance was carried to such a point that all the warehouses in the Rue St. Honoré were emptied of their stores of silks, velvet, tissues, lace and embroidery, and it was found necessary to check the overindulgence in rich stuffs by a sumptuary law. On the present occasion a laughable incident occurred. A Mississippian of the lower order, but who was arrayed in a blue velvet coat bedizened with gold lace, and furnished with buttons of solid gold, deliberately took it off, and gave it to a broker with whom he was bargaining to make up the amount of a share. But he undertook to redeem the pledge within five minutes, and so expeditiously were operations conducted that he got back his coat within the given time. Strange indeed was the manner in which the transactions were conducted. The brokers refused nothing but specie. A young, beautiful and richly-dressed woman, having no other means of obtaining the shares she coveted, gave all her jewels to a broker. One man paid for a few shares with his title-deeds, and deemed himself singularly fortunate. Another offered a mortgage deed, and a third bills of exchange. Mistakes were occasionally made, and a priest in his hurry to conclude a bargain handed over a billet d'enterrement instead of a billet de banque. Ainsworth's "John Law."

PHILLIPS AND MALIBRAN.—Mr. Phillips was the principal baritone at Drury-lane during Malibran's engagement, when she received the large figure of one hundred guineas a night. When the "Maid of Artois" was rehearsed in full for the first time, Malibran was eager to have the air "The light of other days" transposed and put into her part. Balfe, of course, declined, and so did Bunn. "Don't tell me," she said, "I shall speak to Phillips; he is very good-natured, and if he knows I prefer it in my part he will let me have it." Phillips, however, though unquestionably good-natured, was too wise to part with a song so valuable; and the lady was so much chagrined that she said she would not play in the opera. She had been announced, however, and there was no escape for her. Malibran was incapable of bearing malice, and, at supper at Mr. Balfe's, after the first performance, when Mr. Phillips came to the door, it happened that there was no light in the passage, and she ran to the top of the stairs, exclaiming, "Quick, give me a candle: here's 'The Light of Other Days' coming up in the dark!"

NAPOLEON'S HEAD-GROOM.—Mr. Gamble has now been a faithful servitor of Napoleon III. for eighteen years, having been with him in England when his fortunes were, perhaps, at the lowest ebb; followed him to France as President of the Republic, when a couple of saddle-horses composed nearly the whole of his stud; and being now the practical head of the most numerous and best appointed stable of any sovereign in Europe. Mr. Gamble is a Scotchman by birth, from Ayrshire, and evidently possesses all the good sense and shrewdness which are the peculiar gifts of his country people, and which stand him in such good stead in the important and responsible functions which he is now called upon to exercise. He forms the solitary exception to the employment of a foreigner in the establishment placed under his control. All the other employés are French, down to the lowest groom and stable-boy.—Paris Letter.

PARISIAN DETECTIVES.

THE other morning, after I had been exploring the environs of Paris (among other interesting sights I saw I witnessed the shell fishes which built great hills around Paris still at work in ponds, raising the ground higher and higher by their multiplication and subsequent death,) I entered an eating house whose wine needs no bush. While eating a rustic meal, Boniface, winking knowingly, said to me: "There is a grand hunt here this morning." "A hunt?" "The police are out." "The deuce!" "They have left their clothes and watches here and habited themselves in blouses." "Bah!" "They are after a painter who has been secreted here these six weeks gone. Wait and you'll see them back." I waited. In about an hour three men in blouses entered the room. Boniface winked and I knew these were the men. They called for something to drink and eat. All three of them looked like painters: their blouses and caps were smeared with paint which attested many day's hard labor. They discussed the mysteries of the paint-pot, cursed the American war for its influence on spirits of turpentine, which are now supplied by an article pernicious to painters' health, and for preventing the usual number of new buildings from rising. The meal drew near its close. The eldest painter clapped one of the men on the shoulder, saying: "Pierre Chartol, we have been looking for you this month gone. You must go with us. We belong to the administration." This is the euphonious equivalent by which these people always designated the police. You may imagine the real painter's countenance at finding himself caught. He had made sure nobody knew his whereabouts, and here he was ensnared beyond all hope of release. The way he was caught was this: the secret police, dressed as painters, strolled about the neighborhood; they were familiar with a description of the man's appearance. They were not a very long time before they discovered a man habited like themselves; a closer inspection satisfied them: "Good morning comrade, how is work with you?" "It is slack, friends." "Would you like to find work?" "Indeed, I should." "Then come along with us—but first let us have some victuals. There is between comrades no handsel money like a bottle of good wine." "Agreed!" You know the rest. One of the secret police went up stairs to change his costume; upon his return the other retired for the same purpose. Their costume was packed in a handkerchief which each carried in his hand, and they departed, carrying off the palid, quivering wretch they had entrapped.

I think I told you at the time it occurred of the seizure of the papers of Mons. Veuillot, the well-known writer in the Catholic newspapers. It is quite recently I heard the particulars of this seizure. As it is quite characteristic of this nation I repeat it to you. It will be remembered that Mons. Louis Veuillot went to Rome after repeated conferences with the archbishops, bishops and more eminent clergy of France, and it was suspected that he visited the Papal capital in order to concert some means of action against the French government. The latter consequently took great interest in the eminent writer from the moment he quitted France till his return. Among the people who "scraped acquaintance" with Mons. Veuillot during the journey was one of those round-faced, good natured fellows, whom travellers like to meet, for they are a sort of buffer which seem to keep life from those harsh knocks and sudden recoils we all meet. He was a wine merchant and was on his way to Rome to sell his stock to the wealthier dignitaries of that church. He quitted Paris the same day and by the same train with Mons. Veuillot; they stopped at the same places on the way, put up at the same tavern at Rome, and, as luck would have it, returned to France by the same steamboat and to Paris by the same train which brought Mons. Veuillot back.

They reached Paris together at 7 o'clock in the morning, which, as it was winter, was very early. Mons. Veuillot had scarcely got home when a visitor called upon him. It was a commissary of police. He was very polite but—he had a search warrant and he hoped Mons. Veuillot would excuse him for executing it as none knew better than he did the exigencies of duty. Mons. Veuillot replied: "My dear sir, you may consider yourself very fortunate. Had you called here ten minutes sooner you would not have found me at home. I have just reached Paris." "We knew it, Mons. Veuillot, and therefore declined presenting ourselves until we were assured of your return." "I am extremely obliged for this attention and I beg pardon for obstructing the execution of your duty. A search warrant I think you said? Feel at home. Search (Mons. Veuillot threw open doors and drawers as he spoke) where you please, as you please, right and left." "Don't give yourself the least trouble, Mons. Veuillot, I cannot consent to disturb anything in your library or study. Do not be uneasy on that score. I must deprive you of but one single object—that little carpet bag on your chair." "My dear sir, that little carpet bag contains the objects I have just brought with me from my journey, and I have not as much as had the time to open it." "And that is the very reason, my dear sir, why I took the liberty of disarranging you at this matutinal hour. That little carpet bag contains a correspondence which must be examined by the Prefect of Police."

Mons. Veuillot was astounded by the rapidity and precision with which the police acted. So he said after he saw his carpet bag in the hands of the Commissary of Police: "Pray tell me, since the search is at an end, how did you contrive to know exactly where the papers you wanted were?" "Nothing was easier. You were watched during your whole journey. You placed all of your baggage in the luggage car except this carpet bag which you never lost sight of. Evidently the carpet bag contained something precious." "Who watched me?" "A person who lost sight of you as little as possible, and who returned to Paris with you this morning." "In the same carriage with me?" "By your side." "Surely you do not mean Mons. de ——?" "No. I have no hesitation to tell you who it was; 'twas ——." "What! the fat wine merchant?" "Yes." "You are jesting! I have never seen an honester face. You wish to throw me off the scent." "I can easily convince you." The Commissary of Police gave a tap on the window. In an instant the wine merchant stood before Mons. Veuillot, still wearing his travelling costume. The writer gazed on him with admiration and said: "Well friend, you are hard to beat." The spy bowed. "Pray are you still in the wine trade?" "No, I have retired." "That is a pity; for upon my word I should have ordered ten casks from you for the way you bamboozled me."—"Spiridion" in the Boston Saturday Gazette.

A BALLOON ASCENT.—The second ascent of M. Nadar in his "Géant" balloon has for some time past been a favorite topic with the Paris and Brussels journals. This time there was to be no failure. The earth was to be forsaken for an indefinite period, and the aeronauts were to exist in Cloud-land till it became tiresome to remain longer from the parent earth. Advantage was taken of the September fetes at Brussels, when the ascent could be made in the presence of a multitude worthy of the occasion. The Indépendance of Tuesday evening contains a long and excited description of the event. Public feeling had become raised to the highest point. "The emotion was universal, and in the crowd which from an early hour on Monday was circulating in the streets in an agitated and anxious state, there ran a kind of contagious fever which overcame the coldest and affected the most apathetic." Railway trains had brought in thousands from the country, nearly doubling the population of the city. In the enclosure were the King, the Duke and Duchess of Brabaut with their children, the Count of Flanders, the members of the diplomatic corps, the ministers, the burgomaster, sheriffs, and all the municipal authorities of Brussels. The King arrived at four o'clock in the afternoon, and at once sent for M. Nadar. Amidst loud "bravos," the burgomaster brought forward the well-known photographer and aeronaut. The King gave him a most gracious reception, and, after talking with him for some time, presented him to the Duchess of Brabant. Before leaving the presence of royalty, M. Nadar presented the King and the Duke and Duchess of Brabant with three copies of his book, The Memoirs of Géant." His Majesty and their royal highnesses "appeared touched by this act of homage. The crowd shared in this simple, honorable and affable scene, and hearty cheers greeted Nadar as he descended the steps." Meanwhile the "house" which is attached to the balloon was being stocked with the matériel of the expedition. Amongst other things, water, provisions, clothes, scientific instruments, and sixty carrier pigeons, "rapid messengers intended to give prompt news of the aerial excursionists in case they descended in a country unprovided with the telegraph," were taken in. Also, there was a variety of arms necessary to protect the balloon in its descent from "the brutality of ignorant peasants." The original number of excursionists was thirteen, but four of these, on account of the great weight attached to the balloon, were obliged to be left behind. At half-past five o'clock, the names of the travellers having been called over, the cords were cut. "At the solemn moment," says the Indépendance, "a hundred thousand hearts were beating—a hundred thousand eyes were watching the movement of the balloon—the decisive order 'Lache tous' was given, and the balloon rose, slowly and majestically, amidst the acclamations of the crowd." A brief postscript to the above narrative reduces the ascent to the modest proportions of a very ordinary aeronautic trip. Neither the pigeons nor the provisions, nor the clothes, nor the arms to keep off savages, appear to have been required. The balloon left the ground at half-past five o'clock, and came down very quietly near Ypres shortly after ten. A strong easterly wind was carrying the voyagers to the sea, and their faith in the elaborate preparations appears to have failed them.

BURNING A HOUSE TO ROAST A SNAKE.—Every one knows Lamb's humorous account of the origin of roast pig. The ingenious Chinaman who burnt down his house to enjoy the luxury of cooked pork has nearly found a rival in this neighborhood, if we may rely on the evidence in the case of Marshal vs. Long. Plaintiff summoned a defendant in the police court yesterday for £2 10*s.* damages, caused by the destruction of tools. From the statement of the former, it appeared that the articles in question had been burnt, and that premises worth £200 had also narrowly escaped destruction from the fire lighted by defendant. Long, in defence, said he had only endeavored to kill a snake, and that the flames would have been put ont if he had not been told by the owner of the property that they would do no harm. Certainly a more original mode of getting rid of a dangerous tenant than applying fire to the grass has seldom been resorted to. Daylesford (Australian) Express, April 7.

LORD PALMERSTON'S POPULARITY.—In his inexhaustible good spirits lies the secret of his popularity, in spite of the blunders and greater sins of his colleagues. The way in which the country distinguishes him from them was happily put by Mr. Knightley at the Towcester banquet: "The noble Lord and his Ministry seemed to be always engaged in the game of 'chuck farthing,' and it was invariably with 'Heads I win, tails you lose.' (Cheers and laughter.) Whenever it came up 'head,' the noble viscount very properly had all the credit; when it came up 'tails,' the rest of the Ministers came in for the blame. He did not mean to say that the noble viscount was guilty of unfair play, but that the people, it was evident, was determined to give him all the half-pence and the rest of the Ministry all the kicks.

DE QUINCEY says: If once a man indulges in murder, very soon he'll think little of robbing; from robbing he next comes to drinking; from that to ill manners and procrastination. Once enter this downward path, and you know not where you'll stop.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And when in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?
A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29-3m

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-sceptic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

Sold by all Druggists, and by

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the United States. RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

WITH the view of making the ensuing volume of THE CALIFORNIAN more acceptable to its readers, we propose to give a brief summary each week of all the important events that transpire in connection with the Winter and Spring Campaigns. It will be necessary, owing to our limited space, to give only the prominent events as they are communicated to us over the wires, preserving, as nearly as possible, chronological order. There is so much sameness in the style of the despatches which appear in the dailies, people are apt to forget them as soon as read. In THE CALIFORNIAN (which from its convenient form is generally retained for binding) the record may be preserved, and its patrons and subscribers have the benefit of an historical record for future reference:

November 15.—Sherman returns to Atlanta with the Fifth Corps, leaving two corps in Tennessee, under Thomas, to watch Hood. Tears up the railroad from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and sends the iron to the former place. He also destroys Atlanta. The factories, mills and foundries between that city and Chattanooga have been laid waste. Railroad from Atlanta to Eckworth torn up; Cartersville and Calhoun burned.

Nov. 19.—Breckinridge, with 10,000 men, attacked Gen. Gillem near Bull Gap. Gillem met with a reverse, and fell back on Knoxville with a loss of 400 in killed, wounded and missing. Other reports state that Gillem repulsed Breckinridge's attacks repeatedly at Strawberry Plains, and withdrew in good order.

Reports of Sherman marching south with an army of 50,000 men, including 9,000 picked cavalry under Kilpatrick. His destination supposed to be Macon, Ga., thence to Milledgville, where he will divide his army, sending one portion to Augusta and the other to Savannah, and afterwards he will move on Columbia and Charleston.

On the 19th, Hood's entire force, including Forest's cavalry, were near Tuscumbia and Florence, Ala., closely watched by Thomas.

Considerable firing heard on the Appomatox; had continued for thirty-six hours. It proved to be picket-line fighting.

Charleston and Fort Sumter still being shelled; 100 thrown into the former and 250 at the latter within a few days.

Rumors of Early withdrawing from the valley of the Shenandoah.

Despatches of the 18th say that Grant is preparing for a great movement; his army supplied with eight days' rations and 100 rounds of ammunition, and ordered to move at a moment's notice.

Georgia makes proposals in her Legislature for a Peace Convention. Richmond papers ridicule the idea.

The Dutch Gap Canal on the James reported nearly completed, and the Second, Fifth and Ninth Corps of Grant's army march towards the Appomattox.

An escaped prisoner from Charleston describes the lower part of that city untenable on account of Federal shells. There are 5,000 troops in and around Charleston.

Nov. 20.—Rebel papers say that Sherman was within twenty-five miles of Macon on the 19th. Hood, with 35,000 men, was still near Florence. Dick Taylor is said to have joined him with 10,000 troops.

In the rebel House of Representatives, on the 18th, Henry S. Foote of Tennessee proposed, by resolution, that "the war be continued till the independence of the South is acknowledged."

Moseby writes to Sheridan that he has executed seven Union prisoners in retaliation, and declares his intention to continue if any more of his captured men are executed.

The Richmond Sentinel announces that Gen. Gus Smith is aiding Howell Cobb in opposing Sherman's march.

A dispatch dated Quebec, Nov. 24th, says that owing to reliable information that the Southerners and rebel sympathizers in certain towns in Canada are manufacturing clandestinely, and collecting at all convenient points, shot, shell and cannon, the Government has issued a proclamation prohibiting the exportation, or carrying coastwise or by inland navigation, of arms or ammunition.

November 23.—After Gillem's recent defeat, Breckinridge advanced to Strawberry Plains and Blair Cross-roads, threatening Knoxville and Cumberland Gap. On the 21st, Breckinridge advanced to Powell's Bridge, six miles from Cumberland Gap. Heavy skirmishing took place all day. Burbridge has moved out from Lexington with a strong force, to protect the Kentucky border from the anticipated invasion of Breckinridge's force.

SANITARY FUND.—Since our last issue the gold and greenbacks have been steadily flowing into this treasury. The Executive Committee acknowledge the receipt of the contributions at fifty-six polls during election day amounting to $3,645 96 in coin and $233 90 in Legal Tender Notes. Twelve soldiers and societies have contributed $597 in coin and $5 in Legal Tender Notes. The Oroville Sanitary Fair (past proceeds) has given $966 50 and the party given by Jas. S. Skinner at White Oak, $260. Mr. R. B. Woodward's exhibition on Thanksgiving day, in spite of the unfavorable day, afforded $163. The contributions from sundry towns in the interior amount to $158 25; and from sundry persons in this city $132 50 in coin, $40 in Legal Tender Notes. The total receipts for the past week have been $5,863 31 in coin, and $278 90 in Legal Tender Notes.

A LAUDABLE OBJECT.—At a Sunday School meeting in Ohio, the subject of the slim attendance of the pupils at the school being under consideration, a promising lawyer offered the following resolution: "Resolved, That a committee of young ladies and gentlemen be appointed to raise children for the Sabbath School."

ODDS AND ENDS OF THE WEEK.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

JACK FROST spread himself this morning, clothing the housetops and everything else with ghostly raiment, except, perhaps, the tip ends of early risers' noses.

The most interesting event of the day, (to parties connected with the CALIFORNIAN, especially,) was the announcement that our illustrious predecessor, "Podgers," had surfeited his appetite for the gay and festive life of a newspaper publisher, deciding, like the wise men we read of, to go East. Pease be with him! He left the pod with his old jours—but they say they know beans.

That pun on a popular Punster, so fearfully and wonderfully made, reminds me—and let it also remind you, gentle reader!—of the punishment inflicted to-day by the County Court on John Pinto, George Wingate, John R. Pate, John Bassett, George Sibley, Pat. Toomey, and George Wright, who were severally convicted of nipping things on a large scale and sent to the Penitentiary for a sufficient term of years to make them penitent.

Postmaster Perkins received by the Constitution the new envelopes, prepared under the last Congressional law regulating postal matters. The price is $3 18 per hundred, in Legal Tenders, or postal currency.

The Franklin Light Infantry, (Capt. McComb,) and State Guard, (Capt. Dawes,) have taken the third floor of the new building recently erected on Market street, nearly opposite Dupont, for an armory.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 20.

THE mass of the community indulge their vanity this morning with clean shirts and shaves, and saunter forth to their meeting-houses to show each other how well they look. I only had time to attend about two dozen of these assemblages, and found them conducted in a very orderly and quiet manner, considering the fast characteristics of Californians generally. It speaks well for the efficiency of "Bief Jurke," and, in fact, the whole Police Department.

But I closed the day's rounds with a visit to Dashaway Hall, and learned from Esquire Cook that our beloved city was indebted to the potent influence of the Dashaways, mainly, for the admirable order and immunity from crime and misery with which we are now blessed. I was so impressed with the arguments and eloquence of the learned gentleman that I decided to connect myself with the institution the first Thursday night I could find time to attend, and actually joined in a Dashaway hymn, led off by President Whitney.

Subsequently, quite a spirited debate sprang up between my companion and myself, which lasted till 3 in the morning, (by that clock on Montgomery street which the Alta man puffs every time he is hard up for an item,) as to which of the moral elements of society was entitled to the credit of making everybody so obedient to the dictates of the law and of common sense? The conundrum is almost transparent; yet I had to fill this stupid fellow with lager bier before he could see that it was the PRESS!—for that divine institution reaches——. But it is unnecessary to explain.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

WOKE up this morning with a violent headache. Must have resulted from discussing abstruse moral and political ethics last night. Mention the circumstance as a warning.

The editor of one Spanish paper pleads guilty to libeling the editor of another paper of the same nationality, and the Court promises to give him his deserts next Saturday.

The first overland mail for some weeks, owing to severe snow storms near Salt Lake, was received at the Post-office to-day.

The Harbor Commissioners tear down the old wharf at the end of Jackson street. A new one is to be constructed within fifty days, 555 feet in length by 50 feet in breadth, at a cost of $16,000. Still, McEvoy & Co. have the contract.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

TO-DAY Montgomery street presented a scene well calculated to rouse from his grave the original Fool-Killer, fortunately defunct. I trembled in my boots lest that terrible event should happen. Not for myself, particularly, but for my fellow-citizens to the number of many thousands, who dropped their tools and deserted their counters, and rushed like mad into Montgomery street, trod on each other's corns, tore their coats, and stopped the progress of the cars—all to witness the fulfilment of a ridiculous wager between a couple of waggish butchers, on Lincoln's majority in California reaching 12,000. The terms of the bet were that in case the majority named was given, one was to wheel the other on a wheelbarrow from the corner of Montgomery and Market streets, through Montgomery, to the Bank Exchange, at the corner of Washington street, where he was to treat one hundred persons. A band of music accompanied the party, playing lively airs, and the Irish Giant attached to Gilbert's Museum bore the American flag. It was impossible for me to get near the Bank Exchange to report what occurred there, but we are assured by newspaper men who were there, in anticipation of the event, that there was more fun than many of them could stand up under.

Nineteen thousand ounces of gold were deposited at the Mint to-day. Most of it arrived from the Northern coast.

James H. Moore, a gas fitter, while engaged in fitting up a new house on the corner of Second and Howard streets, had the temerity to sing out "Head of company to the right," to a company of cavalry connected with the Provost Guard of this city. "Several of the soldiers dismounted and gave him a handsome drubbing," says a morning paper. Warrants were issued for the arrest of the soldiers, but Gen. Mason assures Chief Burke that he will not be permitted to serve civil process on men under military authority.

The Teachers' Institute adjourns for one month.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

SAMPLES of the Sanitary Cheese, so well ventilated by the press during the past three months, were sent East to-day by Mr. R. G. Sneath. One box goes to President Lincoln and another to Father Bellows. That's the last we'll ever see of that cheese!

Mr. D. Norcross, while riding in a street-car, saw a friend beckoning him from the sidewalk, and carelessly stepped off to speak to him. His foot slipped and he was carried under the step against the rail, tearing off his pantaloons and barely escaping a serious injury.

Warren Leland, a pioneer newspaper publisher of San Francisco, (when printers received $150 a week for their services,) who subsequently learned how to keep a hotel, achieving high distinction in that line of business, arrived here on a "flyer" by way of Salt Lake, Idaho and Oregon. He returns soon by the overland route.

A stranger was found dead this morning, sitting in a doorway on Leidesdorff street. He had evidently died instantly and without a struggle—probably from heart disease. The deceased had dark hair and red whiskers, and was dressed in dark clothing. There is a scar on the left temple, and the end of the little finger on the left hand is lacking. His age was apparently about 35 years. [Since the foregoing was put in type he has been identified as a man named Nichols, from Barry county, Illinois.]

The Constitution carried away $1,074,203 85 in treasure.

The day closed with something to be thankful for to-morrow—a glorious rain. Rejoice, ye cattle on a thousand hills!

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 24.

THANKSGIVING! Thirty thousand turkeys! Pumpkin pies! Old folks at home! "How do you do?" Good cheer on Rincon Hill! Ditto ditto Russian Hill! Do. do. Telegraph do. Turkeys in the station house! Chickens and Chinese! Soldiers in the streets! Ladies on the balconies! H-o-o-r-a-y! Johnny's come marching home at last! No—he says now he won't go home till morning.

☞ Mr. Editor, you can have these "notes" if you can decipher them. I haven't a very clear recollection of what—for you see * * * * I'm too full to talk turkey.

NEW BOOKS.

WE have room for but a brief notice of the following works received from Messrs. Roman & Co.:

The Winthrops. A Novel. 18mo. pp. 319. New York: Carleton, 413 Broadway.

A "quiet family story," which the author offers with a prefatory apology for its lack of excitement and sensation, on the ground that the present epoch gives enough of the sensational element in real life.

Nearer and Dearer. A Live Story. By Cuthbert Bede, B. A., author of Verdant Green. 18mo. pp. 225.

An humorous English story illustrated after the fashion of Thackeray, by its author.

"Old Jack" and his Foot Cavalry; or, A Virginia Boy's Progress to Renown. A Story of the War in the Old Dominion.

A biography of Stonewall Jackson for children, illustrated.

MANY FACTS IN A SMALL COMPASS.—The number of languages spoken is 2,094. The number of men is equal to the number of women. The average of human life is about thirty-three years. One-quarter die before the age of seven. To every one thousand persons one rarely reaches the age of one hundred years, and not more than one in five hundred will reach the age of eighty. There are on earth 1,000,000,000 inhabitants. Of these about 33,333,333 die every year, 91,824 die every day, 7,789 every hour, and sixty every minute. These losses are balanced by an equal number of births. The married are longer lived than the single. Tall men live longer than short ones. Women have more chances of life previous to the age of fifty years, but fewer after than men. The number of marriages is in proportion of seventy to one hundred. Marriages are more frequent after the equinoxes, that is, during the months of June and December. Those born in the Spring are more robust than the others. Births and deaths are more frequent by night than by day.

GETTING USED TO THE YANKS.—A soldier from Atlanta says:

The young ladies don't seem at all afraid of the Yankees, for they may be seen promenading the streets, well dressed and many of them very refined and pretty. I noticed a bevy of young misses dancing on the grass behind a very fine residence to the lively airs played by General Sherman's band. They seem to have quite forgotten the fearful carnage of the past month.—Ex.

These young ladies are the regular "last ditch" stock, and doubtless resemble their fire-snorting daddies in sentimental warfare, as well as their liability to capture during a real engagement. Will they ever be reconciled to the hated plebeians? Never. Their lives—their whole lives will be cheerfully given to conquer the ruthless invader, and they marry him only to save him for new tortures. Carson Evening Post.

WET AND DRY.—What a great propensity people have for imbibing "something" in rainy weather! How can one account for the paradoxical fact that the wetter they get the drier they are? We dropped into Squarza's yesterday afternoon, and from the concourse we found practicing at his bar, concluded that Signor Squarza was a great benefactor in these wet times, and that the compounds of his laboratory were more sought after than India-rubber overcoats and umbrellas.

FOR THE BALL, THE BANQUET, THE BOUDOIR.

A few drops of Phalon & Son's Extract of the "NIGHT BLOOMING CEREUS" surrounds the person with an atmosphere of lavishing fragrance. The perfume is not evanescent. It outlasts the rarest European scents, and is more exquisite than any of them. Fashion and taste recognize it as unapproachable.

Manufactured by PHALON & SON, New York, and sold by all Druggists.

TO THE PUBLIC.—Go to the South Beach Bathing House, foot of Third street, near the Camanche, for comfort, pleasure or health; where can be found at all hours warm, cold, or shower Salt Water Baths. The water is taken through pipes extending over five hundred feet in the bay, and as pure as can be drawn from the ocean. The public have only to give this place a trial to satisfy themselves that this is the best fitted up Bathing House in this city—the North Beach House having blown up.

N. B.—The boiler and machinery are entirely separate from the Bathing House.

VALUE OF HEALTH.—Upwards of thirty years since, Dr. BENJAMIN BRANDRETH introduced to the community a vegetable pill which has since become the household medicine of tens of thousands of families in the United States, and throughout the countries of Europe and South America. When first brought to the notice of the public, few could be persuaded of its virtues. Gradually, at first, it was tried, and then, as case after case of recovery from many diseases reached the ears of the public, its value increased in what might be called geometrical proportions. Medical men, who had seen patients recover rapidly by the use of BRANDRETH'S pills who had for indefinite periods of time been under their charge without showing signs of improvement, began to despair, believing that the great secret of life and health had been discovered, and their occupation was gone from them. Some, more enterprising than their fellows, at once adopted into their practice the great conservator of health, and their success corresponded with their liberality. Since then, the Brandrethian system has been in the ascendant.

It is said that no habit has spread throughout the world so rapidly as the use of tobacco. This is a mistake. It has taken two hundred years to make the nicotine plant known to the nations, while in less than a quarter of a century the Brandreth Pill, as a purifier of the stomach and bowels, and as a preventive of every fever known, no matter by what term called or from what cause originated, has become the indispensable necessity of every people on the globe, civilized and barbarous.

It may be asked, why is this preparation so eminent over others? We answer, because, above every other, it does its work directly.

It cleanses the system thoroughly of every impurity, and restores the blood to its pristine condition. Dr. Brandreth holds, and his conclusions are based on physiological as well as Biblical fact, that all diseases originate in the blood, and that a medicine which seizes upon and purifies it, places the body that contains it beyond the possibility of abnormal action. It is not necessary to attempt to vindicate a theory so self-evident. We know that a fountain cannot send forth at the same time sweet water and bitter; and we also know that we cannot look for health where the fountain of health is corrupted. Purify the blood system, and life, strength, youth, and absence from disease are assured. These, the Brandreth Pill not only promises, but gives. Let those who would go through existence without sickness or even momentary pain, remember that the preventive from every ill lies in the vegetable preparation whose active and passive virtues no sane man will dispute, known as the Brandreth Medicine.

It is hardly necessary to state that Dr. B. continues his unremitting care in the manufacturing department of the Brandreth Pills; or that they are entirely free from chemical or mineral preparations; these facts being well known and understood to be so. While mercury and bleeding, and other deleterious remedies are becoming more and more unpopular, the Brandreth Pills are extending the sphere of their usefulness by the appreciation of a generous and discerning public.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, be will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electropathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathise with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required!

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

CAUSE UNKNOWN.

FEW things now-a-days are taken for granted. Almost all Englishmen have access to some Encyclopædia, a very large number possess an Inquire Within, or The Reason Why, to which works they are continually referring for information upon subjects which our ancestors were quite content to accept as facts. They thought a cow was so called to distinguish her from a horse; we are not happy unless we can trace the derivation of the word to some barbaric language of the remote past. We discover that gov was the Palæozoic for stars; that probably those stars were in the Milky-way; that g and v stand in that ancient tongue for c and w; and the connection between the Milky-way and a gov or cow is obvious. That settled, our cream has an additional flavor.

An unfortunate child who observes that the kettle boils, runs a narrow risk of being told "the kettle does not boil, but the water inside," and of having a lecture upon heat, radiation, evaporation, and so forth, administered upon the spot; and when Molly the housemaid is rushing off to the cellar during a thunder-storm, we stop her with the information, that when she sees a flash of lightning, it has passed, and she is safe from its effects.

But, after all, the few particles of knowledge we have acquired are but as "grains of sand picked up on the seashore;" and the highest privilege which can be attained by philosophic study is the power of catching a glimpse at the infinity of our ignorance. He is a short-sighted man who repines at this. Alexander's ennui, when he boo-hooed because he had won the champion's belt, and no one would fight him for it, would be nothing to his who had conquered all the secrets of nature; the sage who knew everything would be no better off than the fool who knows nothing, just as he who possesses a riddle-book full of conundrums, of which he knows the answers, is in the same position, so far as his own private delectation goes, with the man who has no riddle-book at all.

I must own, however, that it is irritating to the human mind to dwell for long on any perceptible effect without being able to assign any cause for it. Now, there is that bewildering mariner's compass; why, O why will that needle always turn to the north? If the magnet had existed a century or two ago, and had now lost its efficacy, no amount of evidence would have persuaded us that there ever had been such a thing; if it were recently discovered, and there were only one compass extant, we might declare the effect due to sleight of hand or diabolic agency. But when we navigate the world by its aid, when every poet alludes to its fidelity (I do not know why; a pointer is not generally considered "faithful" to a partridge), and when we wear it on our watch-chains, it is pushing scepticism beyond rational limits to doubt its existence. Yes, I am afraid there is no denying the fact, that a needle rubbed with a loadstone, and nicely balanced, will point to the north, though why it should do so, science cannot at present tell us. It is true that folks talk gravely about the "magnetic current," but they might just as well talk about a magnetic gooseberry, for they have not the slightest idea what they mean.

There is another dreadfully unintelligible fact, how does the electric fluid find its way unguided from Liverpool back to London? That a piece of zinc and a piece of copper put into acidulated water, and connected with a wire, should cause a decomposition of the water; that the zinc should at once resolve itself into a positive, and the copper into a negative pole, and that a current of electricity should immediately commence flowing along the wire from the former to the latter—these are abstract facts which the mind can receive without discomfort; nor is there any reason why the wire should not be long enough to go round by Liverpool, or to Melbourne, for that matter, and after leaving the positive pole, take the electric fluid round the world, before it returned to the negative pole, within a few inches from it: but that, if you break off the wire at Liverpool, and bury the end in the ground, and also bury in the same way the end attached to the negative pole under the battery in London, the electric fluid should find its way back through the earth alone unguided from wire to wire, is a mystery which to my mind is almost awful. There must be hundreds of return currents crossing and recrossing each other underground, how is it they never interfere with one another, or lose their way, or become amalgamated, or blow up, and make lightning?

What causes laughter? I go to a theatre to see a pantomime. The well-known countryman passes over the stage with his basket of country produce. I know what the clown is about to do: he is going to steal a lump of butter out of that basket; he will then smell it, and lick it, accompanying this somewhat unrefined action with much winking of the eyes, and other inelegant pantomimic action typical of greedy delight; then he will make a slide with it on the boards, whereupon a policeman will enter, and tumble down. I have seen all this a hundred times, and it all happens as experience taught me to expect. Why should the muscles of my face become convulsed? Why should I expel the breath from my lungs in gusts and bursts, instead of inhaling and exhaling in a rational manner? That this physical phenomenon should occur when the mind is affected by ludicrous ideas, is curious enough, but that it should be excited by the clown's nonsense is incomprehensible. I have no sympathy with dishonesty, gluttony, or mischief. If I saw a policeman in real life tumble down, I should not feel amused; fear lest he should be hurt, and a desire to help him up, would be my only emotions. What is there, then, to tickle me in the scenic representation of such an accident? Why, again, should one sometimes be compelled to smile when one is really sorry, and particularly anxious to look duly mournful? If you have never experienced this, reader, be grateful, and do not condemn your less fortunate fellow-creatures as hard-hearted and unfeeling. There are many persons who could no more recount the details of any very dreadful and calamitous event, which was not absolutely personal to themselves or their auditors, without grinning, than they could feel any real amusement in the matter. They are as sorry as the gravest, they are beyond measure vexed with themselves for their unseasonable mirth, but the more shocked others seem by their levity, the less are they able to restrain it.

Crying, again, is even a more mysterious action than laughing. Every human being is a pump, from which it is easy enough to get water when it is new, but as it grows older, the springs dry up, and the well must be sunk deeper. It generally requires an Artesian bore to get a drop out of a man of sixty, unless, of course, he is a judge. That, by the by, is another insoluble problem: Why do judges retain the power of being "visibly affected" longer than other men?

Why do dogs turn round and round before they settle to sleep? Why do hostlers hiss while cleaning their horses, and paviers cry "Humph!" with each fall of the rammer? Why do Americans talk through their noses, and mispronounce English? Why do people kiss?

There is a rolling fire of small-arms for you; now comes a big gun.

What causes dreams? Endless are the theories which have been started on this subject, any one of which may be true, as all may be false. But I must take this opportunity of contradicting a theory which is embraced by many, that all dreams occur at the instant of waking, for I have listened to persons carrying on broken conversations in their sleep for full a quarter of an hour at a time, and their slumber has been sound and deep at the time, as, on more than one occasion which I can remember, the dreamer has sat up, pointed to imaginary objects, and laughed aloud, without waking.

All the facts alluded to above are evident to our senses, though we are at a loss how to account for them; but there are also a vast multitude of doubtful effects, for which no causes can be assigned, floating about the world, so few of which have any real existence, out of the imaginations of mankind, that many scientific minds have acquired the habit of scouting the idea of believing anything on evidence which they cannot account for; and when the clever ones are put in the wrong, which happens occasionally, ignorance and superstition receive an accession of strength, which shows the philosophers that they should beware of dogmatism.

For example, the old women of Switzerland were accustomed to administer the ashes of burned sponge as a remedy for goitre; and a physician to whose knowledge this came, analysed the substance, and finding nothing which could act as an antidote to the complaint, pronounced the whole affair to be quackery. "Burned sponge cure goitre!" cried the medical world. "Pooh!" "But they say that several patients have derived benefit from it." "They say, indeed! Who says?. What medical man has adopted the treatment and watched its effects? Why, my dear sir, it is impossible: Dr Test has analysed the supposed remedy, and," etc. Future inquiries and experiments proved, however, that some sponges did, when burned, deposit iodine, which is a very active agent in the cure of goitre; so that when the old women had the luck to hit upon an efficient sponge, they were right enough, and produced a real effect, of which their too rashly-spurned medicine was the actual cause.

No doubt, however, it is highly necessary to limit the field of human inquiry somewhat, by taking some pains to ascertain the positive existence of alleged phenomena, before we set to work to discover the agency which produces them. I therefore entirely dismiss from my catalogue of Unknown Causes all such mysteries as the bad luck attending enterprises commenced on Friday, or the fatality which dogs a party of thirteen on leaving a dinner table. With regard to the first of these fast-decaying superstitions, almost every day in the week has been considered the unlucky one by some age or nation, so that a lazy man might find a good excuse for never doing anything at all. And as to the latter, when we consider that the days of man are three-score years and ten, of which the majority of guests at a dinner party have already spent twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty, not to mention those who who have passed the allotted span; that we ride in small-pox hospital cabs, in railway trains, and on bucking and rearing horses; that we shoot, eat mushrooms, take voyages, etc., I think that we must own the first man who discovered that it was at all extraordinary that one out of thirteen mortals assembled together should die in the course of the year, to have been a most ingenious person.

There is, however, another class of apocryphal effects attributed to apparently inadequate causes, which, perhaps, ought not to be dismissed with such cavalier abruptness. Take, for instance, the wart mystery. Who does not know some one, who has known some one, who once heard of some one who had warts on his or her fingers; who went to a gipsy; who was directed to put as many stones into a bag as he or she had warts, and throw it over a wall; and who, complying with these directions, was suddenly relieved from the discomfort? The candid inquirer who endeavors to sift this evidence is met by many difficulties, it is true. Did the gipsy touch the warts? or rub them, or prick them? How long was it after the incantation before the warts disappeared? Had any ordinary remedies been applied previously? Is it in the nature of warts to go away of themselves? As you question, the fact slips, like the objects of your research, from between the fingers. But there ought to be some method, surely, of coming at the truth with so many living witnesses as there must be. Would not some senatorial reader be so kind as to move for a committee to report upon the matter? The time of M.P.'s is often occupied in more futile and far less amusing investigations; and now that the corn-laws are finally done with, why should not the cognate matter of warts engage some portion of the public attention?

The present writer would gladly save the public purse by devoting himself to the thorough sifting of this affair, were it not that his energies have been lately exhausted by the endeavor to get to the bottom of another semi-superstition, the custom, namely, of sticking the poker up against the bars to revive an expiring fire. The custom originated, I believe, in the idea that fairies were putting the fire out, and that the sign of the cross made by the poker resting perpendicularly against the horizontal bars charmed them away. That was a poetical and not irrational fancy, perfectly legitimate and respectable, for fairies are beings which we know nothing whatever about, and might be subject to mysterious laws which do not affect ourselves. But of the thousands and tens of thousands who practice at this rite at the present day, very few believe in fairies, and many prefer to stick the poker through an ornamental part of the grate, below the bars, where it does not make any form of the cross at all. My first inquiry, therefore, was as to how the effect was produced, and the answers I received were far from satisfactory. Some drew my attention to the sensible improvement in the burning of the fire, produced by inserting the poker under the lower bar, gently raising the coals, and leaving it there: as if there were any analogy between an act which gives the fire the vital air for want of which it is expiring, and one which does not alter the position of the coals. Others appealed to the effect of holding a newspaper before the fireplace; though how a bar of iron, which does not shut up any part of the grate, is to cause the furnace-blast, which is produced by excluding the air from the top, and forcing it to rush in through a contracted space below, they left it to my unaided imagination to determine. Other and wiser perpendicular poker-fire-revivers declined to account in any way for the practice of their irrational rite. They confessed that the modus operandi was an entire mystery, but contended that constant experience had convinced them of the fact. Now, this placed the question at once in my catalogue of Unknown Causes, so I saw that the first step to be taken was to ascertain whether the effects asserted were real or imaginary; and this, as far as I could determine, was the result of my observations: A fire having burned very low, the person desirous of reviving it clears out the dead cinders which are choking it at the bottom, breaks up and gently raises the mass, which has been baked into a solid cake, throws in perhaps a lucifer or two, and then sets up the magic poker. Sometimes a dense smoke arises from the smouldering embers, the gases ignite, a flame bursts out, and the fire burns up; whereupon the operator ignores the real causes which have led to the desired result, and points with triumph to his fetich. Sometimes a lack of skill or inflammable gas causes the experiment to fail, and then "the fire has gone too far;" but the faith in the charm remains. Now, it is my honest belief, founded upon much personal observation and experience, that precisely similar results will happen if the poker is allowed to rest quietly in the fender. It is the old story of giving a sick man a dose and an amulet, and attributing his recovery, not to the medicine, but the charm.

Although writing anonymously, I shudder at my rashness in penning this opinion, knowing as I do the anger which it will excite in many believers in the poker, and reflecting upon the formidable instrument which they love to handle. Let me hasten to appease them with what, if their theory be true, will be a most valuable suggestion: let them have their grates made with a bar of iron crossing the others perpendicularly in front, or underlying the bottom, according to their peculiar idiosyncrasy—they can have both, if they desire to make assurance doubly sure—and then their chimneys must always "draw" well. Who knows? Perhaps their fires would become vestal, and never go out!

A Hint on Carpets.—Of all the expensive things in a modern English house of the ordinary class, perhaps carpets are the dearest. In case of removal, they become almost useless, and have to be sacrificed at any price that can be got for them, because, having been cut and measured for one room, perhaps of a peculiar shape, they are useless in any other; for if the pattern could be matched, which it often cannot, a bit of bran-new carpet, sewn on to a bit not so new, would be out of harmony, and tell a story which the pride of poverty would rather were concealed. The Persian and Turkish system of carpeting rooms is infinitely better and prettier than ours. The Persian carpets, especially those from Resht, are exquisitely beautiful. Their colors are brighter, designs prettier, and they are far more durable than European carpets. They are made in strips usually between two and three yards long, and about one yard in breadth, to go round the sides of the room, with a square carpet of any size preferred for the centre. They do not require to be nailed or fitted, and a sufficient number of them will, of course, carpet any room, however large or small. They have a very rich and grand appearance, too. In summer they are easily taken up, beaten, rolled and put aside by a single man-servant; and, in the hot weather, why should we not more generally imitate Continental custom, by painting or polishing our floors? Floors, painted or polished, look far prettier in July sunshine than any carpets, which are then mere fusty traps to catch dust, harbor insects, and retain bad smells. Everything has its use and its season. The use and the season of carpets are not in the summer-time. Where it is impossible to paint or to polish the floors of a house, the employment of oil-cloth will be found good economy in summer, and far cleaner.—All the Year Round.

The Human Pulse.—The human pulse has in all ages been consulted as an index of health and disease. It is a kind of dial within us which gives us both the measure of time and of health. The pulse of a person in health beats about seventy strokes in a minute, and the ordinary term of life is about seventy years. In this seventy years, the pulse of a temperate person beats two billion, five hundred and seventy-four million, four hundred and forty thousand times. If no actual disorganization should happen, a drunken person might live until his pulse beat this number of times; but by the constant stimulus of ardent spirits, or by pulse-quickening food, the pulse becomes greatly accelerated, and the two billion, five hundred and seventy-four million, four hundred and forty thousand pulsations, are performed in little more than half the ordinary term of human life, and life goes out in forty or forty-five years instead of seventy. This application of numbers is given to show that the acceleration of those forces diminishes the term of human life.—Medical Journal.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF

Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills so sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholics and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.
